"The community of the future," writes Doctor Pitkin, "will not be the few hundred or thousand people around the old crossroads. It will embrace 50 small towns and the county seat. There will be between 100,000 and 300,000 people in this social unit. They will not be packed together like the inhabitants of the typical modern city of that size. They will be spread out over two or three thousand square miles, each family having its own home, each village having its own playgrounds, motion picture theater, and parks. America will be dotted with tens of thousands of pleasant homes having big back yards in which tiny workshops will be busily turning out an indescribable variety of special products. All the villages and small towns of the United States will become industrial centers. But in a new and better way. All their factories will be new, perfectly lighted, and operated electrically. Most of them will be surrounded by spacious lawns and flower beds. Roads will be so good and autos so fast and safe that the owners of large farms between the villages will either live in town or be there much of the time, and still manage their acres with ease. Nobody will live more than ten miles from a town with every convenience and with a well-developed social life. It will require not more than 20 minutes for the farthest farmer to reach such a town outside of the Rocky mountains and parts of the Southwest."

Building Laws of Vital Interest to Community

Discussing the question whether good housing is possible to families of small means, Dr. James Ford, Ph. D., executive director, Better Homes in America, says:

"If the average life of a house is from one-third to one-half of a century, most persons cannot live in new dwellings. So our first question is to ask how old houses can be made better.

"The first obvious answer is that there should be good building laws, health laws and housing laws, wisely framed by citizens who have practical knowledge of the subject of housing and who, though cognizant of practical difficulties, have standards that are high and sound. Such laws must be enforced by wise and practical citizens whose standards are also high.

"As no law is self-enforcing, it is necessary to have in each city a body of citizens to make a continuous survey of housing needs and standards, and to lend public officials their moral support and assistance. Because there is no such medium of community service in most cities, standards of housing legislation and enforcement are relatively low."

Consider Value of Trees

The value in effect of old trees on a place cannot be overestimated. For the new house they may form the perfect setting, linking it with the grounds and with the entire landscape. An oak, a pine, a few cedars or an old apple tree may impart the happy effect of age, of being settled and of belonging to the site.

Many achitects and owners have wisely and cleverly taken advantage of such opportunities, thereby gaining what could not be had by the planting of any number of perfect specimen trees from a nursery. Nature may have achieved a picturesqueness and irregularity that art cannot achieve.

Tree-Lined Highways

A sensible agitation has been started by various bodies for the planting of trees along the highways of the Dominion.

Apart entirely from what the provinces have done towards such planting, several rural municipalities have shown a willingness to assist the innovation.

Tree-lined highways not only add to the attractiveness of rural districts themselves, but are a magnet of attraction to tourists.—Montreal Family Herald.

Highway Made Attractive

Experts from the Missouri College of Agriculture co-operated with state highway officials in the beautification of federal highway No. 40, from Kansas City to St. Louis. The college made a soil survey along the highway to determine what types of grass would grow to the best advantage along the different sections, while highway officials took steps toward the removal of all unsightly stands and billboards and other advertising along the right of way.

Civic Leadership Important

Good roads make most towns accessible to many more outsiders than formerly reached them. These towns are called upon to provide facilities for the traveling public. They also are on exhibition. Local pride is stimulated. The town that has a leader or a group of leaders with vision and persuasive powers of organization is a fortunate town.

WHITE FOR GIRL GRADUATES; WOMEN BECOME HAT-CONSCIOUS

SOON the "sweet girl graduate" will be having her day. After the dreadful strain of "exams" is over and all the available credits have been garnered in, depend upon it Miss Graduate's fancy will immediately turn not "lightly" but seriously to the question "what to wear" when she curtsies as her coveted diploma is handed to her.

In creating frocks for the youthful graduate designers are working along the theory that "beauty unadorned is adorned the most." Therefore while the materials employed are superlatively lovely, such as exquisite white chiffons or georgettes, dotted swisses, too, if you please, and especially organdies—for the sheer materials are "it" this season—they are made up in the simplest possible manner. That is, to all appearance, they are decidedly ingenue, but in reality they are fashioned with meticulous observance as to detail and effect.

TWO GRADUATING COSTUMES

The picture does not do justice to the very lovely frocks here shown. It is almost impossible for the camera to catch the subtlety of the soft accordian pleating which enhances the dress of chiffon which the seated figure is wearing. Then, too, there is a wide border of sheerest net footing about the hemline and its exquisite daintiness cannot be told in mere black and white print. The boutonniere of self-fabrics is very effective, and even if one makes this frock at home, this decorative flower could be easily fashioned.

The frock to the right lays claim to style distinction because of its bolero, although if preferred, in making this model, the sleeves could just as well be sewed in the jacket, thus offering the prospect of a sleeveless frock with the bolero removed. An ensemble of white georgette such as this is practical. With care it can be beautifully laundered so that the summer through it will look like new.

Organdie posed over a slip of white lace presents a new effect which designers are playing up with fascinating results for the girl graduate.

Hat for Every Occasion.

A hat for every occasion and for each costume a matching or complementary hat—to this extent has the modern woman become hat-conscious.

No better proof of the general acceptance of this new hatology can be found than that of the millinery displays themselves. Everything in the way of a chapeau is included in the new collections from beret and the close-fitting little shapes which Paris adores, to brims which reach the limit when it comes to dimensions and to diversify.

Thus it is that when milady a hat-buying goes, she thinks in terms of many chapeaux, for she must needs consider the question in its every phase ranging from sports to most formal.

The idea of the ensemble has brought about an interesting development in the way of hats made from the same material as the frocks or coats, as the case may be, with which they are worn. In the early spring this vogue expressed itself in little tweed berets or turbans matched to the costumes with which they were worn.

For summer wear designers are creating charming styles of self-fabric, such as the handsome wide-brimmed model in picture below. This ensemble hat is a Jean Patou model, and being Parisian there is no surprise in the fact that it is carried out in black and white, for fashionables in the French capital continue to exploit with enthusiasm this combination. The printed chiffon employed for the crown and part of the brim of this hat is identical to that used for the dress. The brim border and crown band are of very fine hand-sewed black straw.

SHOWING THE LATEST IN HATS

As to the three snug-fitting types shown, they also are French models. The attractive little hat at the top is one of those close-fitting turbans draped of lace straw, a type which is quite the ideal of la Parisienne. The cap with the bow at the back (centered to the left) is significant in that it has a wide cuff formed of small velvet flowers, and "they say" flowers will be in evidence to a greater extent than for many seasons past. The smart tan beret below is a typical sports model. It is crocheted as is also its matching scarf. There is a fitted band of self-colored grosgrain ribbon. Not only is the little hand-crocheted tam or beret in fashion, but toques draped of wide crochet straw banding are very popular.

The years have stalked in slow procession by.
But they and all they spell cannot erase
A shivered tree against the saddest sky
That ever shrouded earth; a shell-shot space
Where broken shapes in khaki blankets lie,
Some moaning in the slanting spears of rain,
Some peaceful with the peace of those who die,
Hoarse guns that crack and crash—again—again;
Lead feet that drag along a dull, wet lane,
Chill streams that from the rusty helmets flow,
And sodden clothes; and dank winds that complain
And scourge the flesh, and wring the heart below.
Ah, comrades! When the wind and sky are gray,
Twelve years ago may be but yesterday.

Vision of the "Last Comrade"

By HENRY W. COLBY

Revised by Sydney E. Ford, Ford Gardens, Bridgewater, Mass.

March your proudest, honored patriot, while your step is firm and strong;
Shout your loudest, valliant soldier, as your voice peals out in song; Sound your glory with the echoes of the trumpet and the drum,
That the story may be ringing through the centuries to come.

Loyal hearts are warmly throbbing to the music of your tramp; Memory starts the songs of legends of the bivouac and camp;
Almost seems the scene repeated, were it not that while we gaze,
Waking dreams of faltering footsteps cloud the light of other days.

Time is lending with stern usury the days that fly too fast;
Backs are bending with a burden that must weigh them down at last;
Ranks are thinning while no fresh recruits can swell your gallant band;
Death is winning slowly, surely, every fight with certain hand.

Have you never, valiant soldier, as you decked those graves in May,
Thought that ever in the future there must come a fateful day,
When some lonely, weary veteran, last survivor of his post, Must the only remnant linger of a vast and mighty host?

Have you pondered which among you last should lay his burden down?
Have you wondered whose the weary brow to wear this martyr's crown,
Who the tired, tottering one shall be,
the last sad tale to tell,
Uninspired by any sight or sound of those he loved so well?

As romance creates heroes, with imagination free,
In my fancies I have pictured whose this pilgrim-form might be;
Lifelike, truthful, bright before me, as a portrait from the sun,
Stands a youthful, boyish volunteer of Eighteen Sixty-One.

Just a lad when he enlisted, able scarce
his gun to bear,
But clad in knightly spirit, such as manliest heroes wear;
And ye err, who in your careless thought speak slightingly of youth,
Which may stir with glowing ardor on the side of God and truth.

But the boys are boys no longer; youth is manhood—manhood, age.
And the joys of youth have ripened to the wisdom of the sage,
And though real yet Life's battle, pressing constant, close and fast,
Not less real is the soldier to his memories of the past.

How the faces of his comrades must to him grow doubly dear,
As he traces by their footsteps, passing milestones, year by year,
And what clustering emotions must be struggling in his soul,
As the mustering-out commander drops another from the roll.

There must come a halt ere long, brave youth; ah! youth no longer now;
"Nearer home" with every passing
May, is traced upon thy brow,
And each season that the march of Time is written on Life's page
Stamps as treason youth's brave contest in its battling with Age.

But within my fancy's vision, at no far-off distant day,
With the din of conflict lost in space and hushed all hostile fray,
On some May Memorial morning shall our soldier boy of yore Plod his way in painful solitude for aye and evermore.

Not again his lot to decorate the graves of gallant men;
Quite in vain the strength, says Holy Writ, of fourscore years and ten,
And it needs no voice prophetic to remind the valiant soul
That his deeds henceforth can have no speech except on Memory's scroll.

Time has banished with a cruel hand
the lightness of his tread;
And the vanished power of manhood's pride is slumbering and dead,
And the graves where sleep his comrades, move him sadly as he sees
How the braves have fallen round him like the leaves from off the trees.

Stilled the clamor and the turmoil of those ancient days afar;
Gone the glamor of the trappings and the pageantry of war;
Pomp and splendor pass unnoticed,
relics of a bygone age;
True and tender memories only mark the veteran's heritage.

Dreams of battles haunt his visions—always dreams of battles won,
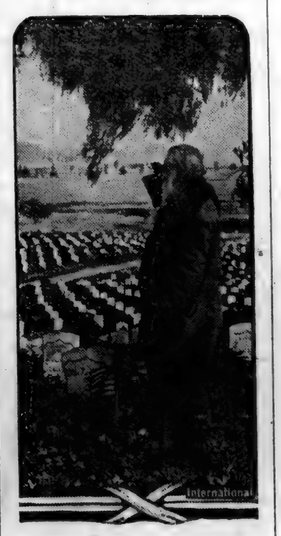
And he prattles in derision as the foemen break and run;



Bloodless fields of restrospection constant crowd upon his brain
And he wields in thought, with waning strength, the ancient sword again.

Nurse thy dreaming, gallant soldier—
'tis the privilege of years,
That, in seeming, Age may wear again its earlier smiles and tears,
And the heat of battle kindles from the embers of decay,
As the beat of drum and martial note shall charm the years away.

Fare thee well, thou faithful sentinel upon thy lonely round!
Legends tell in song and story of the pilgrim's hallowed ground;
But my thought in farthest reaching pictures no more sacred shrine
Richer fraught with precious memories than this resting place of thine.

May the God of battles comfort thee,
thou weary one and worn;
May the sod that rests above thee
bloom with each Memorial morn.
And the waves of loyal gratitude, in never-ceasing tide,
Guard the graves of those we hold so
dear with reverence and pride.

Bird Sanctuaries Dot Coast of New Zealand

Several islands along the coast of New Zealand have been set aside as sanctuaries for the native birds which are becoming scarce on the mainland.

One of these is Little Barrier island, a steep, wooded islet about 50 miles from Auckland. Ships of all kinds pass within a few miles of it on their way to and from Auckland, but no one is allowed to land without permission of the government, and except for the caretaker, who keeps watch for possible marauders, there are no human beings on the island.

Near Wellington is Kapiti island, big and hilly, once the stronghold of Maori chiefs; it is now the equally well-defended citadel of the native birds.

What this Doctor did for Humanity

As a young man the late Dr. R. V. Pierce, practiced medicine in Pennsylvania and was known far and near for his great success in alleviating disease. Finally he moved to Buffalo, N. Y., and put up in ready-to-use form, his GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY, the well known tonic for the blood. This strength builder is made from a formula which Dr. Pierce found most effective when in private practice.

It aids digestion, acts as a tonic and enriches the blood—clears away pimples and annoying eruptions and tends to keep the complexion fresh and clear.

Would you like to try this doctor's laxative free of charge?

Every family has occasional need of a laxative, but it should be a family laxative. One that can't form a habit, but can be taken as often as needed. When breath is bad or tongue coated. Or appetite fails. Only a doctor knows the right ingredients. Dr. Caldwell discovered the correct combination years ago. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin combines harmless herbs and pure senna. It starts muscular action and soon corrects constipation. Gently, but surely, it relieves a bilious or sluggish condition. It is mild. Delicious. Effective. All druggists keep this famous prescription ready, in big bottles. Or write Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, Monticello, Ill., for a free trial bottle postpaid.

Students of Magnetism

The magnetic properties of certain substances were known to the early Greeks. The earliest systematic investigations of magnets were made by Peter Peregrinus of Maricourt, a student of Roger Bacon, and in August, 1269, he wrote a letter which was the first treatise on magnetism. It was not until 1581 that Robert Norman gives a clear statement of the fundamental laws of attraction.

There is one thing sure they either missed a good time, or a series of many wars.

Arthur Brisbane on Pennsylvania's Primary

The following is Brisbane's comments on the primary election of the state of Pennsylvania on May 20:

"Prohibitionists will find comfort in the Pennsylvania election. Recent wet and dry polls seemed to indicate that the whole country is wet and longing for beer. Gifford Pinchot ran for governor of Pensylvania as an ardent dry and won. There is a difference between straw votes and real votes.

The Literary Digest wet-dry poll discovers that forty-three states are moderately wet, five dripping wet, five bone dry.

To repeal the prohibition amendment would require the votes of thirty-six states. If the attempt is ever made it will be seen that of those forty-three "moist states half will vote against repeal."

Dr. Scott McBride Says

That the prohibition law is being observed in Chicago as well as any other laws and that he challenges anybody to prove that the law is a failure. Mr. McBride is the general superintendent of the Anti Saloon League of America. He says in part: "One night, at about half past ten, I walked through the old barrel-house district on Madison Street and State Street and the old red light district and I failed to see one individual under the influence of liquor, nor did I see any street fights. I challenge any liberal to prove to me that conditions are any worse than in the old liquor traffic days. The liquor people know that prohibition at its worst is better than the old time liquor traffic at its best.

And the people are back of prohibition. They were for it when it was first submitted to them and they are for it today. The Literary Digest vote proves they are for it. If ever anything encouraged the drys it is the Literary Digest vote. Of 4,800,000 votes cast less than 3,000,000 were for repeal. Where are the silent 15,000,000? According to the Digest's own words on the subject, not everybody had a chance to vote in this poll vote, which is in the opinion of many, sufficient reason for doubting its authenticity, regardless of its good intentions.

Successful Vacation School

If any of the citizens of the community want to know what benefits the children of the community have received from the Vacation Bible School, all you will have to do is to ask any of the little tots what they learned at the school and they will tell you. There are some citizens in the community and there might be a preacher here and there that feel the effort is not worth the trouble that is put forth for such work but in each case where there is opposition there can be found a lack of deep sought conviction and a plain vision of what constitutes duty of the church and its membership. Partisan-ism in church life where the social phases are emphasized more than the spiritual, are responsible for the lack of interest. As a matter of fact, however, our two ministers, a large number of teachers were on the job and the school went over very successful. These little folks are taking a greater interest in the acquiring a religious education than the older folks and the result will be manifest when the time shall come when this training will show itself. When this school was organized a few years ago, the sponsors of the movement thought that the school would not live to tell the story, because it was thought that many people did not favor a unified effort on the part of the church membership. But this has proved to be somewhat of a nightmare. Broad-mindedness and faithful cooperation has marked all the efforts of all four churches in the township in their work for one Master. This paper wishes to go on record as being wholly in favor of these schools and their promulgation.

School Term Is Over

Our official school year closed here on last Friday, graduating eight seniors, seven girls and one boy. The graduates are as follows: Hilda Morr, Grace Curie, Marguerite Wilson, Ruth Bishop, Dorothy Knight, Naomi Baker, Virginia Gither and Clifton Draggoo. This community has watched these eight young people grow up and develope into educated young men and women, who took part in the programs of their school and church activities willingly and faithful and it is with a feeling of deep regret that we feel that they are to leave us.

Of course the ultimate result of education is service to the world and we know that they cannot be with us always, yet they will be missed. We will watch them as they go out into the realm of service and see in what degree education will be used in making them successful. We can see them now, with diplomas under their arms, walking up to Old Man World, hitting him a sharp rap on the back and knocking his spectacles off his nose and saying, Hello Friend, how's everything? What have you got for me to do? Then Old Man World, struggling between a sore back and a kind heart, will put his hand on their heads and say: "Give to me the best that you have and I will send the best back to you" and with a benediction for their eternal success he will put his spectacles back on his nose and take up the news of the universe and continue his cold attitude by reading away the centuries.

Alumni Banquet Was A Success

One of the best Alumni banquets ever held was on last Saturday evening in the gymnasium with a large attendance. The success of the banquet was in its uniqueness. In previous years all high school banquet programs wer on the formal order but this year the committee conceived the idea of social informal entertainment which proved to be appreciated. The program was appropriately opened with a selection by Donald Kinsey's orchestra, followed by a short speech of welcome by Martha Miser and the response by Virginia Ginther in which both speakers stressed the importance of living up to the standards for which their education stood for.

Robert Ulm, the speaker of the evening got the audience and their stomachs in a receptive mood for the dietetical part of the entertainment by a good speech on "Pies." Mr. Ulm introduced his subject by saying that he was not like the minister who announced that he would speak on the subject, "The Devil, and that he was chuck full of his subject." He said that the audience would soon bear him out in his assertion that he was not full of his subject. He said that pies were responsible for more of society's woes than war or pestilence and that man has been innately a Pious creature always. His subject was divided into five divisions arranged in the order in which they usually come in the lives of people. He wittingly depicted the mud pie age where the pie murderer got his inspiration for later depredations. Social pies, political pies, religious pies, and many other pies came in for their share of cutting mentioning the pies which have nothing much in them but crust.

Other features of the program were: Solo, Donald Kinsey; vocal solo, Joe Woodcox; reading, Thelma Curie and Spanish Fantasy by Inez Kinsey and other members of the Alumni.

After the two course banquet was served the audience was invited to linger and visit with the old scholastics and friends and meet the new relatives that had been annexed to old alumnites by cupid since their school days. This event closes the activities for this school year.

Billy Sunday on Prihibition

Billy Sunday says: "If the Eighteenth Amendment is a failure, then sunshine, rain, virtue, integrity and honesty are failures.

The arguments that the prohibition laws of the country are directly or indirectly to blame for the violation of the laws and the crime of the country is as thin as soup made from the shadow of a starved chicken.

If the opposition to the Eighteenth Amendment by the wet and bum element of the land is not treason, then Benedict Arnold was a Sunday School Superintendent.

Lloyd George said, America has the gold because it has not the saloon.

A drinking man is the last man hired and the last man that has been fired.

We want the country to go so dry that a man will have to prime himself before he can spit.

Who advertises for drinking men to fill the responsible places in factories, banks, laundrys, newspapers, grocerys, railroads, airplanes, battleships, doctor's offices, and dental parlors? Nobody.

Two Cents For Power

Last year, average expenditure for candy amounted to slightly more than 2 cents per day per person. During the same period the 84,000,000 people living in electrified homes spent $604,000,000 for electricity, less than 2 cents per day each.

This is a graphic illustration of the fact that one of our most valuable commodities is likewise one of the cheapest. Electricity lights the home, operates the washing machine and refrigerator, heats the iron and does a multitude of other tasks, great and small, which are necessary to maintain modern standards of comfort and efficiency in the home. Yet, at the end of the month, the bill for this service is an infinitesimal part of the family budget.

The electric industry has made every effort, not only to improve service, but to lower the cost of the consumer. Its record is one of increasing economy of operation. During 1919 the average steam generating station in this country required 3.2 pounds of coal to produce one kilowatt-hour of electrical energy. Due to the increased efficiency of plants during the past ten years a kilowatt-hour is now produced by the average steam plan with but 1.7 pounds of coal.

Such technical achievements as this may seem of little interest to the general public. Yet they benefit every Acerican home and business by giving better and cheaper electric service.

The Speed Limit

To settle the question of speed limit on the roads, we quote from the legal department of the Hoosier Motorist as follows: "There are very definite speed limits in in Indiana at the present time. The maximum speed in a business district is 25 miles per hour, in a residential district 30 miles per hour, and on the country highways the speed limit is that no person shall operate a motor vehicle more rapidly than is reasonable under the circumstances. This means that a driver must drive so that he can make a stop without endangering the lives and property of himself and others, having due regard to the conditions of the highway, the amount of traffic, etc.

Pennsylvania Primary Vote

A great deal of significance is found in the recent primary election in the great state of Pennsylvania. As is known this state is one of the heavy populated states, in which the ardent wets claimed that the voters would rise up and rebel against the tyrannical rule of the Volstead act (usig their words.) Guided by what they thought to be a good and safe criterion, the Literary Digest Poll in its wet tabulation, the wets were sure that the primary voe of Pennsylvania would be duplicated in last Tuesday's results.

In the straw vote tabulated by the Digest, Pennsylvania gave for enforcement 147,557 votes, for modification 136,233, and for repeal 243,063. If this indication could have been relied on for a correct concensus of the opinion of the people of this state, then it seems that the state of Pennsylvania should have given to its wet candidates nearly the same vote that the Digest's vote indicated—but it didn't nor did it come any ways close. Here is the story of the primary election and its figures:

In the Senatorial race on the republican ticket there were two dry candidates and one wet candidate which ordinarily would place the wet candidate in an advantage over the dry who had two in the field that would split the dry vote. The result was that Davis (dry) polled 715,138 votes, Grundy (dry) 476,279 votes and Bohlen (wet) took third place with 233,877. Adding together the votes of the two dry candidates, Davis and Grundy and we have 1,191,418 dry over against 233,877 wet votes or better than five dry votes to one wet vote.

In the race for governor there was much the same division in the dry forces as in the senatorial race. The dry votes were divided between two candidates while the wets enjoyed one candidate. Pinchot (dry) polled 618,504 votes, Brown (dry) 608,454 and Phillips (wet) 260,283 being third in the

Mr. and Mrs. Harry Laux began house keeping in the Nancy Chaney tenant house this week.

Mr. and Mrs. R. U. Bowser spent Sunday with Mr. Bowser's brother, I. C. Bowser and family of Fort Waayne.

The Alumni of the High School held a reception and banquet at the school building on Saturday night. The new officers are: Ercile Steward, president; Mrs. Cleo Reed, secretary and treasurer.

Memorial Day services will be held on Friday afternoon at the White City cemetery on May 30. Rev. Homer Studabaker will give the address assisted by Rev. Geo. Stoll.

The Young Ladies Social Club met on Thursday evening with Mrs. LaVern Koch at the Raymond Rhodes home. Those winning prizes were Miss Aleine Rhodes, Mrs. Gaylon Tustison, Mrs. Ruby Crafft and Mrs. Troas Carpenter. Miss Katherine Kimes was a guest.

William Baker suffered a stroke of paralysis at the Walter Baker store on Monday afternoon.

Mr. and Mrs. Iven Butler and daughter, of Fort Wayne, were week-end guests of the L. O. Wade home.

Mr. and Mrs. C. L. Whitacre were Sunday guests of Mr. Whitacre's father, P. A. Whitacre of near Ft. Recovery, Ohio.

Don Kimes was taken Saturday morning to the Dr. J. A. Sanders Hospital at Auburn. Mr. Kimes has been ill for several weeks.

The Home Missionary Society will hold an election of officers on Thursday, June 5 at the home of Mrs. Gertie Wasson, south of town.

Commencement exercises were held on Thursday evening at the Lutheran Church. Prof. J. O. Winger, of North Manchester College delivered a very able address to the graduating class and friends. The members of the class were: Virginia Goldsmith, Iris Vanderly, Cecile Shull, Virgil Kimes and Virgil Laux.

The Epworth League will have election of officers on Saturday night at the Methodist Church.

Mr. and Mrs. John Betz, of St. Joe and Samuel Betz were Sunday dinner guests of the Joel Betz ome. In the afternoon they motored to the home of Mr. and Mrs. Glenn Betz of near Woodburn, to call on Mrs. Betz who is quite il.

Mrs. Ella Hughes has been having trouble with a sick cow.

Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Draggoo and children spent Sunday evening with Ford Jackson and family. Mr. and Mrs. Carl Perkins of St. Joe were Saturday evening guests.

We through this part of the country had quite a wind storm, which did a good deal of damage. Blew Charley Murphy's large chicken coop all to pieces and killed 75 young chickens. Destroyed two corn cribs for Chas. Jackson. Blew in a window for Ira Bone also one for Roy Gibford. So you see it was a young cyclone. Don't want any more.

race. Again adding the two drys together we have 1,226,958 for the dry candidates against the wet 260,283. This gives the dry candidates better than four to one over the wet candidate.

It is fair to asume that there was no greater issue before the Pennsylvania voters than the wet and dry issue especially after the Literary Digest had so positively demonstrated the trend of public opinion in that and other states of the union relative to prohibition (as far as any straw votes has the power to demonstrate correctly) and there is no apparent reason to suppose that if the voters of the Penn state thought that there was any wisdom in voting against the dry law they would have done it.

Here are two instances where the wet candidates had the dry opposition divided against themselves and both finished third. People seem to vote different with out straw. It is not our intentions to pick a quarrel with the sponsors of straw vote manipulators but we are of the same opinion of the most of the American people in this voting business. We believe that people vote right when the right time comes and that time seems to be when the regular election arrives. Cold facts never burn any one that's why we discuss them in this connection.

Are You Worth $1.25

A man is worth exactly $1.25 at pre-war prices, according to a Scottish doctor in a health lecture arranged by the local National Health Insurance Committee of Edinburgh.

If the average man were subjected to chemical analysis, the doctor says, he would be found to have in his body:

Fat enough for seven bars of soap;

Iron enough for one medium-sized nail;

Sugar enough to fill a shaker;

Lime enough to whitewash a chicken-coop;

Phosphorous enough to make 2,200 matches;

Magnesium enough for a lose of salts;

Potash enough to explode a toy cannon.

And, he adds, sulphur enough to rid one dog of fleas.

HIS LAST VISIT?

The ranks of those who wore the blue in the days of civil war are fast thinning, and here is one of the last, come to pay his respects to those with whom he fought so many years ago.

Crowning Patriotic Dead

There is a peculiar fitness in the rites of our Memorial day—there is in this observance an expression of both grief and gladness. The emotions of the heart cannot find expression in monuments of marble and statues of bronze. Life cannot have sympathy with inanimate form. But the flowers with which we crown our dead are fit expressions of human love, human hope and human sympathy. The flowers grow and die and live again—fit symbols of immortality. The flowers are full of beauty and abundant in fragrance. They live not for themselves but shed the sweet influence of their loveliness on all about them and make everything in nature glad. No mortal crown of diamonds and rarest gems, however great in value, is comparable with nature's garlands—intrinsically of no value—with which we crown our patriotic dead who shall live in perpetual story.

Wind is a Close Second to Fire

In destuction and damage to property, high winds are almost as culpable as fire. A wind need not be of tornado force to do serious damage; nor is wind damage a hazard peculiar to any section of the country. Exceedingly high and dangerous wind movements have occurred in almost every section of the country and history will undoubtedly repeat itself. Windstorm Insurance is very moderate in cost.

Facts For Farm Folks

Written by AGRICULTURAL AUTHORITIES

PROF. JOHN M. EVVARD

LEGUMES IN THE DAIRY RATION

One of the considerations in building the profitable dairy ration from the farm feed standpoint involves a deliberate selection of the right kind of roughages, the kind that pays the biggest dividend. Our best dairymen insist that the best ration is one that carries a leguminous hay such as alfalfa or clover.

Leguminous hays have a number of outstanding advantages when it comes to building a more acceptable income in the milch cow business. Whether one lives in the North, South, East or West, home-grown leguminous hays are of much importance from the standpoint not only of securing better nutrition of the milking herd but also in developing growth of the young dairy stock. The legumes are of much value, likewise, because of their soil building properties and in many sections of the country, good farming, when combined with dairy production, is not economically feasible unless legumes are used in the crop rotation. From the standpoint of feeding, legumes are of immense value in that they cut down on the grain protien requirements and thus help out on the feed bill.

One must, also, remember that when he is feeding a high-class leguminous hay such as alfalfa and red clover, typical representatives of the legume family, that he is helping out greatly from the standpoint of the vitamin and mineral requirements, both very important considerations in the promotion of balanced feeding. The leguminous hays are, also, especially good in promoting appetite because these hays are quite palatable.

All that we have said heretofore is not in any way derogatory of the value of succulent silages, because the latter, particularly corn and sorghum silage, blend in most acceptably in meeting the roughage requirements when combined with a well-cured, nutritious, leguminous hay. The combination, from the standpoint of economy and palatability, of a high protein roughage like alfalfa and a succulent roughage is an ideal one for fall, winter, and spring feeding.

Even when good pastures are available, leguminous plants such as white clover and others of the same class help out greatly in enriching the grazing.

MORE THAN SADNESS IN MEMORIES

It is impossible to be wholly solemn on Memorial day. The time of year is against it—the soft fullness of late spring, instinct with life, and that holiday promise of long summer days, of vacation and of the enjoyment of all the many pleasant and beautiful things which make this nation one which it is well to live in. Nor is it inappropriate that Memorial day falls when it does, for the nature of the holiday is rather against solemnity, too. It is in remembrance of young men; young men who for the greater part were not in the least solemn themselves; men who liked adventurous things and were fond of living; men who, when people addressed long and pompous patriotic orations to them, squirmed and probably said "Aw, h—ll" but who went ahead under the rifle fire just because they were fond of living and were made that way; men who, as the soldiers and seamen in our wars, defended a nation which, one imagines, they would rather like to think of as enjoying through a pleasant holiday in the late spring.

It is a nation, at any rate, which we often say is their gift to ourselves. Perhaps that is a little inadequate to express the complex and mysterious truth. The politics and the statesmanship of it were more or less above their heads, and at times it may have been just as well. There were some who never knew what it was about and others who did not care, and still other who puzzled themselves fruitlessly over it in the long-drawn agony of hospital tents or the shambles of the surgeon's cockpit. But in the last moments they must have felt themselves parts of a great and thrilling process.

Behind the band music and the parades their invisible files stretch away down a long perspective—young men who were partners to terrible and agonizing experience, but who knew better than to be solemn about it. There are the men whose footsteps left blood in the snow at Valley Forge, the men whose limbs were smashed by the round shot on the gun deck of the Chesapeake, the men who died, in shakos, crossbelts and scorching sunshine, under the scaling ladders at Chapultepec, the men lying wounded under the gun wheels on Seminary ridge, or choking in the soft grass of the Peach orchard or tossing in terrible rows down the Civil war hospitals.

It is a strange army, and a great one, but it is not solemn. Its ranks could stand almost anything, but they could not stand solemnity, long orations, pietism, cant. They gave inordinately, but the suffering did not last long, and it was given because they were adventurous, courageous spirits, lively men who could not see their country in a fight without helping out. Perhaps, in fact, the nation is their gift to us; but if so, it is a gift of so rare a quality, with so many facets, meaning so much both to those who gave and to us who have received, that one scarcely wishes to bring one's self to talk of it.—New York World.

CONTRAST BETWEEN FIATHFULNESS AND SLOTHFULNESS

LESSON TEXT—Matthew 25:14-30.

GOLDEN TEXT—Well done, good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Doing the Best for Jesus.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus' Rule for Promotion.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—How to Use Our Talents.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Stewardship of Service.

This parable, like that of the ten virgins, has a vital relationship to the second coming of Christ. In both instances the unpreparedness for His coming on the part of the people is shown. In that of the ten virgins their unreadiness consisted in their lack of the inward life—absence of the Holy Spirit. In this of the talents, their failure was properly to use the gifts which God had entrusted to them. The first was failure to watch; the second was failure to work. To each of His servants, God entrusted certain gifts and will hold each responsible for their use. By talents is meant whatever faculties and powers one possesses as gifts of God—physical strength, reason, energy, knowledge, influence, time, money, the gift of speech and song.

I. The Distribution of the Talents (vv. 14, 15).

1. It was a sovereign act.

The Lord called His own servants and distributed to them His own money. He did not consult us as to our gifts. The One who created us and absolutely owns us has assigned us our place and given us our several powers, intending that we put them to the best possible use.

2. It was an intelligent act. "According to his several ability."

The God who created us knew our ability to use gifts, therefore made the distribution upon that basis.

3. It was a purposeful act.

The talents were given to be traded with, not to be used for one's own gain and profit, but as stock in trade for the enrichment and glory of the Master.

II. The Employment of the Talents (vv. 16-18).

1. All the servants recognized that the talents were not their own; that they were therefore responsible to the Lord for the use made of them. This is the first principle of right Christian service. We should remember that we are all stewards of the manifold blessings and grace of God.

2. Two servants used their talents. The five-talent man put his to use and gained five more, and the two-talent man put his two talents to use and gained two more. This shows that God's gifts can be increased. The exercise of any gift increases it. The faithful use of what we have in the place where we are will prepare us for greater usefulness and honor.

3. The one hid his talent.

The fact that one possesses but one talent should not discourage him, but rather make him strive the more. God does not reward according to what we possess, but according to our faithfulness. The crime of the one-talent man was not that he had but one talent, but that he hid the talent which the Lord gave him.

III. The Accounting for the Talents (vv. 19-30).

1. Its certainty (v. 19).

There is a day coming when all must give account of their stewardship. Answer must be given as to the use made of God's gifts.

2. The time (v. 19).

It will be at the coming of the Lord.

3. Judgments announced (vv. 21-30).

(1) Reward of the faithful (vv. 21-23).

a. Praise, "Well done." All like to be praised. How blessed it will be to hear from the lips of the Lord Himself, "Well done." b. Promotion. The great consideration for all is not how many talents we possess, but as to how faithful we are in their use. (2) Punishment of the faithless (vv. 24-30). The one-talent man lied when brought to account. a. Reproach. "Thou wicked and slothful servant." To be called lazy is a reproach disliked even by a lazy man. b. Stripped. "Take therefore the talent from him." Even the talent which had been given to him was now wrenched from him. c. Cast out. "Cast into outer darkness." This servant was condemned on his own ground. The very fact that he knew the character of his Lord should have been an incentive for him to have exerted himself.

They Would Come

If we were once to live as though we had something that they (the unbelievers) have not, we would not have to press men to come to us; they would come without pressing.—F. B. Meyer.

With Christ

Without Christ life is as the twilight with dark night ahead; with Christ it is the dawn of morning with the light and warmth of full day ahead.—Philip Schaff.

A Sour Stomach

In the same time it takes a dose of soda to bring a little temporary relief of gas and sour stomach, Phillips Milk of Magnesia has acidity completely checked, and the digestive organs all tranquilized. Once you have tried this form of relief you will cease to worry about your diet and experience a new freedom in eating.

This pleasant preparation is just as good for children, too. Use it whenever coated tongue or fetid breath signals need of a sweetener. Physicians will tell you that every spoonful of Phillips Milk of Magnesia neutralizes many times its volume in acid. Get the genuine, the name Phillips is important. Imitations do not act the same!

Mining Old Industry

It is realized how ancient is the use of capital according to its definition as "the accumulated wealth either of a man or a community, that is available for earning interest and producing fresh wealth." Flint mines, with shafts and underground galleries, have been found in England dating from Neolithic times, 8,000 to 10,000 B. C., showing that a well-organized system of life and labor existed. The significance of this is brought out by R. H. Mottram, a retired English banker, in his "History of Financial Speculation."

Hairless Rabbits

Russian hairless rabbits may yet appear on the scene, pursued by the already familiar—perhaps too familiar—Mexican hairless dogs. In the Journal of Heredity, D. A. Koslovsky of the State Institute for Experimental Veterinary Medicine of Russia tells of several hairless young rabbits that appeared among normal litters in hutches of his experimental animals. Some of them were partly clothed, having hair on their noses, ears, shoulder blades and other bits of their anatomy. So far, however, all the hairless young ones born have died without issue. The breed is therefore not established, and may be difficult to make a permanent one, even if it is considered desirable to do so.

The Mutiny of the Albatross

BY WYNDHAM MARTYN

COPYRIGHT IN THE U. S. WNU Service

THE STORY

Floyd Unwin and Howard Bettington take dinner with an old college chum, Alfred Gibbons, financial magnate. Unwin produces a written pledge taken by the three at college to help each other in adversity, explaining that he needs financial assistance to educate his son Bob and daughter Mary. Gibbons agrees to make a place for the daughter in his organization. Mary Unwin is stenographer to a wealthy debauchee, Elgar Radway. Calling at Gibbons' office, as arranged, Mary is asked to betray her employer's secrets and refuses. Radway plans an ocean voyage to recover from the effects of dissipation. Mary is to go as secretary, her brother to accompany her. Bettington, painting on the Maine coast, is kidnaped, and taken aboard Radway's yacht. His clothes are found by Gibbs, a fugitive from justice, who dons them and goes to Bettington's studio, and there falls to his death. Bettington is questioned by a man known as the "Boss." He is shown an account of Gibbs' death, the body being identified as Bettington. The "Boss" intends to hold Radway for $1,000,000 ransom. Bettington is told he will be forced to assist. Radway becomes desperately ill and dies. The captain shoots a drunken member of the crew and is himself killed by another member of the gang.

CHAPTER IX

Bettington States His Terms

Neither Metzger nor Sam were on deck. They had retired to the accommodation aft, which had so lately been taken by the captain. They knew that the joint authority they were to exercise would not be disturbed by rivalries. They were not yet assured of the course to be taken. On the table before them they put their revolvers. Not in anticipation of disagreement, but rather lest Hallett might come in armed and ready.

"I don't like this Andy Orme," said Metzger. "I don't like him any more than you do that young 'Sparks,' who trots around with the girl."

It was curious that in the moment when grave danger seemed to involve them, Metzger thought only of Mrs. Radway. Sam lacked the volatile spirit of his companion.

"You'll have time enough for that," Sam said heavily. "That ain't worrying me. What are we going to do now?"

"We can sell this boat," Metzger asserted. "I told the doctor that, but he made excuses. He shall forge her papers. I know where I can find a Portuguese trader who will buy her. He will not give much, but what he gives will only be cut two ways."

The treachery to the others was agreeable to Sam. It was the only way out. They continued to discuss the situation. There was Hallett to reckon with and his two adherents. They would be warned directly he left the room where he was hidden; there was no danger to apprehend.

Bettington found Clements had been placed on a wicker lounge. His faded blue eyes peered up into the bright sky; there was still the unfading smile on his face. Even death kept his secret. Perhaps none would ever know by what name in the world of crime he had been called.

A deckhand called Mike was at the wheel.

"Where's Sam?" Bettington asked.

"Went below with Metzger," Mike answered.

Bettington followed them. Metzger and Sam ceased their talk when he came in. They wondered if he had heard any of it. It was a discussion which should have interested any man concerned with the length of his days.

"Well," said Bettington, seating himself, "what's to be done now?"

Metzger elaborated on the simplicity of his scheme.

"The money would have to be split three ways and there'd be a nice little sum. I know men who will buy and ask no questions."

"You'll never sell the Albatross," Bettington asserted.

"Then I know where we can run her and live aboard. It's the Gulf of Nicoya in Costa Rica. There nobody would ever find us." Metzger's face beamed at the thought.

"That's silly," Bettington answered. "Do you suppose we all want to pass our days in the Gulf of Nicoya? You've got the wrong idea. You are afraid to go back to New York, I suppose?"

"Not for me!" said Sam. "The Boss never lied to us. When he said he knew all about us he was speaking the truth. I'm not goin' to run my neck into a noose."

"Doesn't the same fate hang over me? You know it does. I look on it in a different light. Nobody could know of Clements' death for a month, at least. He said the paper wasn't to be opened for a year. I'm willing to take a chance. We all want money, and a lot of it. Mrs. Radway will pay us just the same as she would have paid Clements and we don't have to share with him. Why throw it away? We ought to take it and then go where we'd be safe for life."

Sam was obstinate. To go north meant for him to go to his death. Alive or dead, he feared the man he had followed. Rather a short life and a gay one in some tropic isle, than Dannemora. Also, he distrusted the doctor.

Metzger saw the scheme as a ruse to cheat him of the pleasures he had determined on. He had not forgotten those long hours when he had watched the doctor and Mrs. Radway walking up and down the deck. That he did not immediately counsel the doctor's death was due to the necessity of making him forge a new set of ship's papers.

"There are others on board besides ourselves," he reminded Bettington. "They will not run the risk you look for. We have enough coal to get us to Limon."

"Can you navigate?" Bettington asked. "Can you take us to Limon now Leary's dead?"

"Hallett shall," Sam said suddenly, with ferocity. "I've handled men stubborner than he is and I've broken 'em." He clenched his gigantic hands and the table groaned as he struck it. "I'll break Hallett."

"You've killed him," Bettington said gravely. "We'll leave Hallett out of the question."

"Did I get him, after all?" Sam asked. He sat for a moment thinking of the excellence of his aim. He did not realize the extent of the disaster until Bettington spoke.

"That leaves us with the task of getting some one who can work out a reckoning and get us where we want to go. Otherwise we drift hither and yon till we are picked up by a passing vessel, or have to wireless for some one who can navigate."

"H—l!" said Sam; he turned to the engineer. "Can't you?"

"I thought not," Bettington remarked. "Apparently Metzger doesn't know that Nicoya is on the Pacific side of Costa Rica and to get there we should have to go through the Panama canal and come under the jurisdiction of the United States. Find out who is capable of navigating."

A search revealed none capable. Sam and Metzger looked at one another doubtfully. Metzger feared that Sam was likely to favor the surgeon's plan and, for that reason, raised new difficulties.

"If we do run back to New York," he said plausibly, "how are we going to account for Hallett's murder?"

"It wasn't murder," Sam contradicted. "It was self-defense. Wasn't Hallett armed?"

"They'll call it murder in New York," Metzger assured him, "and you'd go to the chair for it. The Doc knows that as well as I do."

Sam was brought to a realization of the effect of his shots which, for the moment, he had considered unimportant. He looked angrily at Bettington.

"You want me to be put out of the way so you get the money?"

The surgeon shrugged his shoulders. "Anything the majority can enforce is best," he said cryptically, "from their point of view. I am looking further ahead than most of you. I see the Albatross drifting aimlessly around the seas, which will soon be a little too rough for a vessel of this sort. If she doesn't founder she'll be reported by passing vessels and a search will be instituted and we shall all be taken into an American port. What is Metzger going to say to a naval officer who may board us?"

"He's right," Metzger cried. He turned angrily to Sam. "What did you want to plug him for? You've put us all in the h—l of a mess."

"I couldn't stop to think of that," Sam cried as angrily.

"There is a competent navigator aboard," Bettington announced.

"Who?" they asked.

"I can navigate, if I want to."

"If you want to!" Sam echoed. "Don't you want to get out of it with a whole skin? Ain't you in as deep as me?"

"We'll force you to it," Metzger shouted.

"You'll force me to do nothing," the doctor snapped. "I'm the one to make terms; you two have got to listen. Here they are: if the women are left absolutely unharmed and alone, I'll take the boat into Limon."

He sat still utterly unmoved at the blasphemous obscenity which poured from the lips of the two opposite.

"And when we get to port," Metzger cried. "What then?"

"Anything you like," Bettington told him. "A pistol, a knife or bare hands; but not cards with a man like you."

Sam turned on the fuming engineer with an oath.

"You'll get your chance in Limon," he said. "None of that knife stuff now. No quarreling with Doc till then, or I'll take a hand in it."

Metzger was full of quick, passionate gestures; Bettington remained immobile. The doctor's composure could only mean that he was conscious of triumph. While the fore part of the ship would be barred to the engineer, it was free to the surgeon. Maddening images chased themselves across Metzger's brain.

"You think you can amuse yourself with her while we are working for your safety. You think I shall permit it; eh?"

"I shall be on the bridge, you poor benighted ass, trying to take the ship to Limon. My bunk will be made up in the chartroom and I shall be working when you and Sam are drinking and gambling. You're a filthy-minded swine, Metzger, and I'm not so sure I want to wait till Limon comes in sight."

Sam's heavy frame sprang between the two men.

"Not yet," he commanded roughly. "It's Metzger's fault, Doc, and he's full of hooch."

Bettington turned his back on the engineer.

"Send Mike down to help me removed Hallett's body. It's got to be buried decently."

"Anything you say," Sam observed, almost with gratitude. "Radway'll have company now. I'll send Mike down right away," he added, as Bettington moved toward the door.

"He laughs at me," Metzger stormed when the surgeon was gone, "and he despises you. He thinks he is my equal because he is taller and stronger. He looked at me as one looks at a child. He will be a child there in Limon when he sees my knife."

"He Laughs at Me," Stormed Metzger When the Surgeon Was Gone.

"I ain't sorry I got Hallett," Sam mused. "This bird will be easier." He sighed when he thought of Clements. Had he lived Sam would have been certain of success. Clements had made only one mistake. He had not believed Captain Hallett would be capable of shooting him.

Bettington experienced a feeling of dread at the coming interview which would not be banished. He knew that even in so short a time as he had been absent a great deal had been said. Crosby Todd had a quiet obstinacy about him which would, by its very persistence, influence the two who looked to him for leadership.

He found that the unoccupied maid's quarters had been turned into a sitting room for common use. The two boys had berthed forward in Elgar Radway's staterooms. Alone of the four, Mrs. Radway gave him a friendly greeting. But there was a new look of anxiety on her face which he did not like to see.

"Doctor Waite," she began, "I have told them about the ransom."

"There were some things we all had to understand," Todd remarked.

"Just what did you tell?" Bettington demanded.

"Enough to make us want to ask a few leading questions." It seemed that Crosby Todd was constituted spokesman. "They're questions you've got to answer."

"Got to answer?" Bettington retorted. He knew it was absurb to take offence at this obstinate, well-meaning lad who detested him so honestly, but he flushed with annoyance nevertheless.

There was a certain air of triumph about Crosby Todd.

"I told you he wouldn't answer."

"I'm ready to answer anything you want to know," Bettington said quickly, addressing himself to Mrs. Radway.

"It's simply this," she began, with a little hesitation. "Mr. Todd has an idea that you knew of this plan to hold my husband to ransom long before Clements informed me of it. I assured him that I was absolutely certain you suspected nothing until I myself told you." She looked at him with a sort of wistful eagerness. "Please tell him he is wrong."

Bettington groaned. If he answered he would be forced to admit a damning truth or embark once again on the hateful task of lying to the woman he loved. His philosophy of life was not a complex one. To him falsehood was an evidence of fear, a confession that something was terrorizing him. He decided there had been enough of evasion.

"Todd is right," he said, not sparing himself. "I did know of it, but I dared not take anyone into my confidence. Consider the situation and you will agree with me. I was the only man who knew. There were at least three weeks to elapse before any danger threatened and by that time I should have worked out some scheme to save you."

"You might have trusted me," Mrs. Radway said. "I gave you my confidence."

"What plans do you mean?" Todd demanded. He had the air of one who sits on a magisterial bench.

Bettington paid no heed to him. He wanted, more than anything else, to assure Evelyn Radway that he had been dealing fairly with her.

"I wanted to trust you," he said earnestly, "but there were so many better reasons against it. You did not know, for instance, that Clements had arranged dictagraphs in various parts of the yacht. I was beset with dangers. I was being spied upon. I could never be certain that they believed in me."

"Why should they believe you if you were against them?" This from the inexorable Todd.

Bettington experienced a sense of weariness and futility. Was it of any advantage, he wondered, to recount by what unbelievable ways he had been brought to the Albatross? Three of the four would think he lied; perhaps the fourth might wish she could believe.

"If I told you," he said, "you would hardly credit it. I have no time now for bickering and cross-examination. You will discover the truth later. For the moment I am concerned only with your safety. The unfortunate death of Clements has placed all in a terrible predicament."

"Have you the gall to be sorry my uncle killed him?" Todd said angrily. There was disloyalty in allowing such a remark to go unprotested.

"Yes," Bettington said. "That unlucky shot let h—l loose. Clements controlled his men absolutely. If he were alive we could count on getting back to New York unharmed. The men are afraid of touching at any port now where our flag flies, because they know jail yearns for them. They propose to take the yacht to Limon in Costa Rica. There they'll try to sell her. You understand that if they get to Limon we shan't have a chance. We are four to ten. They are armed and we are cooped up here without food. It will take us almost two weeks to get to Limon."

Evelyn Radway shuddered as the image of Metzger impressed itself upon her. Now she knew why he had stared with such insolent triumph. She had no doubt in her mind that the doctor had put the matter as mildly as he could to avoid terrifying Mary.

"What must we do?" she asked.

"I have made terms with them," he answered. "They have nobody aboard who can work out a reckoning now the captain and first officer are gone. It happens I am the exception. I said I would take her into Limon if you were unmolested."

"What will happen to us at Limon?" she demanded. "I don't like the idea of that."

"Nor do I," Todd cried. "I'll tell you what will happen. We shall be at the mercy of men like that savage beast Sam who frightens Mary."

The three looked at him as though he had betrayed them.

Bettington tried to be patient with his explanations.

"I shall not take them to Limon. If I did I should most certainly be going to my own death, for they'd knock me on the head and pitch me overboard directly land came in sight. I'm going to take a chance that they will pass their days in gambling and drink. They won't come to take fresh air. They will drink, gamble, eat, sleep and fight."

"Where will you take us?" Mrs. Radway asked. Her spirits were rising and she looked about her in triumph. He had vindicated himself.

"Savannah, probably. I shall try to get there in the early morning when they are too far gone in liquor to see the landmarks."

"Won't they find you've changed your course?" Mary asked timidly.

"That's the only possible danger that I see. There's a deck hand named Mike at the wheel now. I shan't let him take any more tricks at it. I shall send him below to carouse with the rest. We ought to be able to make Savannah in forty-eight hours, if the men in the engine room do their share."

"You can't be at the wheel two days and two nights on end," Mrs. Radway exclaimed.

"I can, and will," he said cheerfully. "I think," he added deliberately, "that I can succeed if I meet no opposition here." He looked across the table to Crosby Todd.

"Supposing they do find out you're double-crossing them?" Bob Unwin said, with feverish interest.

"More bloodshed," he answered gloomily; the thought oppressed him. He rose heavily to his feet. "I must impress on you to remain here and run no risks; here you are safe. Outside, I can't answer for your safety."

"There's nothing to eat," said Bob Unwin. He realized he was hungry.

"I'll get something," Bettington answered. "Don't open the door to anyone but me."

A few minutes later they heard a strange voice in the corridor. It was Mike aiding him to remove the captain's body. Todd had been much attached to his uncle, who had brought him up since his father went down with his ship at sea, almost a score of years since. There was a certain boyish, passionate loyalty in his regard for the dead man, which increased his suspicion of the doctor into some harder quality of hatred.

"I don't believe a word of his lies," Todd cried. "Mrs. Radway, can't you see he's deceiving you? He knew about these men and yet he pretended it was all news. How can we tell it doesn't suit his purpose to hold us here and pretend he's taking us to Savannah?"

"What are we to do?" Mrs. Radway asked.

Todd had no answer. "I suppose we've got to wait till he's decided what to do with us."

"What dare they do?" Mary asked. She had sat silent all the while. When her question was unanswered she knew what was in their thoughts. "I knew something dreadful would happen on this trip," she said, with a quietness that amazed them. "I had a presentment of evil. I have been afraid of that man they call Sam ever since I came on board. And now he is practically in command. How could you and Bob stand against him? He could kill you, easily, with his fists." She buried her face in her hands. "And when you two are gone, what would become of me? I'm not afraid, dear. I shall not weaken when the moment comes."

Mrs. Radway put her arms about the girl's shoulder. Her eyes were moist.

"Oh, my dear," she said, "you mustn't give up hope. If only you were not so prejudiced against Doctor Waite you wouldn't feel so. I am certain he will protect us. None of you know him as I do. If you did, you would never condemn him. I know we are in danger, but he's standing between the crew and us."

She felt utterly unable to give reasons which would convince the group around her. Every action and word of the doctor's could be distorted into something sinister and threatening. She could not communicate to them the sense of security his protection afforded.

Information of Value in Old-Time Scrapbooks

Keeping a scrapbook is nothing like as common as it once was, but still a lot of folks cling to the old-time practice of preserving newspaper clippings, bits of poetry and other items of interest in this way. How the scrapbook hobby started no one appears to know, but for generations it has been customary to save things for ready reference.

The time was when nearly everybody kept a scrapbook, and no doubt many filled volumes could be uncovered, hidden away among things seldom seen or used. The old-time scrapbook was called upon to settle many an argument, for often the scrapbook contained matter of a controversial nature. In the old days it was nothing uncommon for a public speaker to run afoul of a chronic scrapbook keeper.

Often the keeper of a scrapbook specialized in preserving matter of a certain kind, and the practice still is kept up. Scrapbooks of that type may be filled with a lot of valuable information pertaining to a specific subject. Often a scrapbook kept for a lifetime is an index to the character of the keeper, and in that way descendants have learned more of their forebears.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Twenty-Three Adjectives

A California man, suing his wife for divorce after less than two years of marriage, says that she is "sullen, mean, irritable, morbid, disagreeable, nasty, gruesome, cool, bitter, jealous, heckling, picayunish, loathsome, insulting, brazen, miserly, gluttonish, temperamental, selfish, contemptuous, inattentive, uncivil and inconsiderate."

It is obvious that one who chose from Roget with such care did not mean to imply that she was uncongenial.

Unchanging Time

Today the Arab woman cooks her bread outside the shelter of reed mats and mud, which is her "house," and boils her water over a fire lit in a hole which she scoops out in front of the door. The continuity in the essentials of life is unbroken; we know that as she cooks now, so did her forebears cook 3,500 years ago, and in all likelihood when we come to dig the pre-flood levels we shall find that the same customs and the same devices go back even farther into the past.

Distinguishing Orchestra

An orchestra is distinguished from a band by the prominence of instruments of the viol class.

Her washday story caused Aunt Sue to change soaps

"It's just too wonderful for words, Aunt Sue. I soak everything in creamy Rinso suds — and out they come bright and gleaming! So white, I don't even bother about boiling.

"This way saves the clothes. My hands are spared, too. And Rinso is economical. Cup for cup, it gives twice as much suds as those lightweight, puffed-up soaps."

Rich, safe suds

In tub or washing machine, Rinso is all you need. No bar soaps, chips, powders, softeners—even in the hardest water. A little Rinso gives a lot of rich, lasting suds.

Japan's Model Village Making Good Progress

In striking contrast to the general agricultural depression in Japan is the situation found in the village of Anjo in the center of the main island. Here is a village of 3,900 houses, most of which shelter farmers, which boasts that it has not been mixed up in any farmer-landlord dispute. Its average income per family is three times that of an ordinary farmer. What used to be eight small villages were grouped to form the present village of Anjo and those living there organized themselves into a co-operative group. The introduction of a modern irrigation system helped the scheme to prosper, so that in the 20 years of its existence progress has been rapid. Members of the community do not pool all their resources, but no one person has more than 50 acres under cultivation (there are 8,000 acres in all, worked by the villagers) and all join in marketing the goods. Each family has about 100 chickens and an average savings account of $200, a large sum for a member of the so-called poorer class in Japan.

Little, but Mighty, Good

Col. Pope Hennessy, military attache of the British embassy, was dining in a fashionable Washington restaurant. Rice birds were served. The tiny and delicious morsels lay on slices of toast.

"Poor little things!" said Col. Pope Hennessy's host. "Seems a shame to kill 'em, don't it? How do you suppose they ever murder enough rice birds to make a portion?"

Col. Pope Hennessy turned over an infinitesimal rice bird with his fork.

"I don't know," he said, "unless they use insect powder."

Left-Handed

Left-handed children should never be forced to become right-handed. The brain, which controls muscular movements, would be affected, with possible serious results. Tactful training in the use of both hands is all you should do.

Ancient Chunk of Iron

The oldest piece of iron ever found was under the Egyptian pyramid Gizeh. Its age was estimated at 6,000 years.

Arlington

Vast sepulcher of our heroic dead
Who sleep in glory, thou'rt a hallowed place!
America beholds thy solemn face
With beating heart and lowly-bended head!
Sweet service, this, o'er those who fought and bled,
To save her honor; but thy tombstones grace
Her quenchless spirit in our living race
To emulate their valor o'er us shed.

Proud, in thy shades, as sacrifice speaks out
Majestically in silence, deeds are done
Within our breast; dire battle's flush and shout
We feel and utter; awful fields are won
For Liberty, till deep in souls devout Emotion overwhelms, O Arlington!
—Washington Post.

Day Should Be Lesson to Younger Generation

Memorial day becomes more significant with the passing of the remnant of that mighty host which once wore the blue, combined with the younger army which won imperishable glory for American ideals on foreign fields. It is 60 years since May 30 of each year was set aside by Gen. John A. Logan, commander of the G. A. R., "to inaugurate this observance with the hope that it will be kept up from year to year to honor the memory of departed comrades. If other eyes grow dull, other hands slack and other hearts cold and indifferent to this solemn trust, ours shall keep it well as long as the light and warmth of life remains in us."

The trust has been well kept by the comrades of those distant campfires, but it soon must be passed on to younger generations. In Indianapolis appropriate exercises are held at Crown hill, where the long, even rows of crosses mark the last resting place of soldiers. Flags deck the graves and flowers testify to the reverence which will always be felt for the country's defenders. It is an occasion when the citizen should gain a deeper appreciation of the stately monument which was erected in their memory and for the flag they followed into stern battle and final victory.—Indianapolis Star.

The G. A. R. Forever

The Grand Army of the Republic through its commander in chief has announced that the historic organization will be continued until taps sound for the last veteran. There will be no combination with any other group of veterans or patriotic societies. The wearers of the little bronze button, like a certain other famous soldier group will die but not surrender. The G. A. R. still lives!

This decision is eminently right and fitting. It will be approved by the country in general. The silver-haired immortals who linger in the gloaming and presently will pass from human vision deserve the perpetuation of their Army until upon "fame's eternal camping ground their silent tents are spread."

Salute

They wave a tattered flag and fondle dusty prints
That hold for them the memories of days long since Forgotten by the men who know a stranger war,
And men who said that peace would reign forever more.

With rusty sabers dangling on their hips they come
And hardly stir the breeze with the beat of their drum,
They lead a line of younger men. Soon these pass by
With quicker step, and singing with their heads held high.

O men of Gettysburg! O men of Grant and Lee!
Your drums are hardly heard, but we, who crossed the sea,
Salute you in the comradeship of this last day.
Give us your flag, for we shall march ahead some day!

Dispute Over Question of World War "Firsts"

The question of who and what was first killed in the World war is disputed, just as it is in anything else.

The first American killed in that struggle according to records, was Edward Mandell Stone, who died February 15, 1915, while fighting with the French. The American Legion has so honored him as the first American to fall. Also killed before we declared war was a sailor—John Eopolucci of Washington, D. C. He was drowned when the American steamer Aztec was submarined off France, April 1, 1917.

The first combatant American soldier killed in the war, and the one honored by President Harding as "the first American killed in the war" and who has had a bridge dedicated to his memory as such, was Private James B. Gresham, who fell in action at Berthelemont, France, November 2, 1917.

The first American officer killed in the war is said to have been Lieut. W. T. Fitzsimmons of St. Mary's, Kan.

An army nurse has the distinction of being the first officially recorded wounded American in the World war. She is Beatrice McDonald, a New York nurse trained at the Presbyterian hospital. She lost an eye when hit by shrapnel. She was awarded the coveted D. S. C.

The very first soldier killed in the war, say the French, was Corporal Jules Peugeot, shot while resisting advancing German troops on August 2, 1914, 30 hours before war was officially declared. A monument stands in his honor at Joncherey, near Belfort, Alsace.—Pathfinder Magazine.

Meade Tardily Given His Place in History

That General Meade was not honored with a statue long ago, in place of some who played a less conspicuous part, was largely because the value of his services was not fully recognized in the earlier years following the war. But the tributes of Grant and Lee to his military skill, the record of his long and faithful service prior to and following the battle of Gettysburg, a fuller recognition of the greatness of his chief victory when he had been but three days in command of the Army of the Potomac, together with his unblemished character, have served to give him his rightful place in the history of the nation and the admiration of his brother Americans.—Exchange.

Among Us Women by Mrs Ruth Stone

DAINTY TEA APRON HELPS THE HOSTESS

Entertaining without a maid is partly a matter of systematizing one's work before the guests arrive, and partly one of remaining immaculate and unruffled in spite of trips to the kitchen when the refreshment hour comes around.

For the latter, nothing is of greater service than one of the dainty little Hickory tea aprons of gum rubber which now can be had in a variety of smart, becoming styles, and a veritable rainbow of colors and color combinations. Slipped on and off in a jiffy, this type of tea apron will not ruffle the hair nor crush the dainty frock underneath. No water or grease can come through, and it requires only the services of a damp cloth to render it spotless when the party is over.

Also, the woman who does fine sewing or needlework which must be kept immaculate will find it helpful to keep a Hickory tea apron with her work exclusively for slipping on while she is working on dainty, fragile materials.

SENATE AND HOUSE DISAGREE ON MUSCLE SHOALS—FERTILIZER PLANT IDLE

(Special to The St. Joe News)

Washington, D. C., June 2nd.—Whether or not the one hundred and sixty million dollar fertilizer and explosive manufacturing plant owned by the government at Muscle Shoals will be leased to a private concern or operated by the government is in dispute between the Senate and the House of Representatives.

The Senate passed a government operation bill, but did not require the sale of fertilizer to farmers. The House struck out the Senate Bill and enacted a general leasing bill providing for the leasing of the property with certain terms and safeguards.

Congressman David Hogg pointed out that the government cannot possibly fix nitrogen as cheaply as under private operation and that the high cost by the government would prevent a decrease in the price of fixed nitrogen as Muscle Shoals would be the marginal producer of fixed nitrogen and would determine the price.

Mr. Hogg also pointed out that the government had already kept the plant idle for many years. The general leasing bill includes the specifications of a bill advocated by Congressman Hogg for the private operation of the plant at maximum production, and provide for sale direct to farmers.

DECORATION SERVICES HELD FRIDAY

The decoration services, took place, as is the usual custom each year with a large crowd in attendance. The services have been held in the afternoon in past years but owing to the committee's willingness to comply to the will of the majority in making the afternoon open to everybody to do as they pleased, it was held in the forenoon.

The band of this place, in connection with some band men of Auburn who assisted in the playing, and a male quartet, furnished the music. The American Legion officiated in the parade and the ceremonies at the cemetery.

J. N. Scholes delivered a fine address on the origin and meaning of the ceremonies of the day from the band stand on the public square. Isaac Meese, the only living Civil War veteran in the township was present. He is 86 years old. The Legion Firing Squad was under the command of Capt. R. R. Ridenour.

Spencerville held their services at the cemetery in the afternoon.

OUT-OF-TOWN GUESTS OF THE WEEK

Quite a number of former residents were in St. Joe Memorial Day and the remainder of the week. There was Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Bishop, of Detroit; Mr. and Mrs. Glen Abel, of Peru; Mr. and Mrs. Alvy Reasoner, of Detroit; Mr. and Mrs. Lee O. Tustison and son, also Mr. Charles Tustison, of Defiance; Mr. and Mrs. Albert Caskey and family, of Fostoria, O; Mr. and Mrs. Albert Wade and family, of Zanesville, O; Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Monroe and daughter, of West Unity, O; Mrs. Violet Copp and daughters, of New Haven, scores of Auburn people, and possibly others that we did not see.

PENTECOSTAL CELEBRATION NEXT SUNDAY

Decision Day services and Children's Day exercises at the Church of Christ last Sunday, were largely attended. Eight made the decision for addition to the church and one by transference of membership.

These services were held to precede the celebration of Pentecost next Sunday, June 8th.

An all day meeting will be held then. Bible School and social meeting in the forenoon. Basket dinner in grove or basement.

The afternoon services at 2 o'clock will be in charge of Elder J. O. Rose of Angola, who will deliver the Pentecostal discourse. Other features for the afternoon will be vocal solos by a son of J. O. Rose and songs by a Boy's Quartet of Hamilton.

The communion table will be kept spread during the day for all members of the Churches of Christ. Members from other churches who wish to join in the communion are heartily invited to do so.

SPENCERVILLE BOY GETS RECOGNITION

Howard Beams, of Spencerville, son of George Beams, who is a student in the Cincinnati College of Embalming, received a letter from Governor Myers Y. Cooper, of Columbus, of which he is very proud.

Out of a school of 80 students Howard was one of 15 called upon to go to Columbus and help care for the bodies that were burned to death in the prison fire.

The text of the letter from the governor is as follows:

"On behalf of the people of the State, I wish to express my sincere apreciation of the service rendered by you in connection with the embalming of the bodies of the prisoners who lost their lives in connection with the catastrophe at the Ohio Penitentiary on the night of April 21, 1930.

"The prompt response and the untiring services of men like yourself, who gave unsparingly of their time and energy, enabled the State to handle this trying situation in a most creditable manner. In fact, I am informed that few situations of this character in this country, have been so well handled. We are all grateful to you for this splendid cooperation and your unselfish service so freely given to our State."

CHILD FALLS INTO LAWN MOWER

Leora Wilmot, age 2, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Wilmot, met with an accident Saturday evening, losing her third finger at the first joint and the tip of the first finger, when she fell into the lawn mower.

Chalmer Shuff was putting the mower away when the accident occurred. The child was rushed to their doctor and today she is getting along fine.

ST. JOE WINS MEMORIAL GAMES

One of the largest crowds yet to attend a game at the ball park here came out after the forenoon's decorating program. The weather, while a little cool, did not retard the base ball enthusiasm of the people. The game was close in all periods each team hitting hard and fielding difficult plays. Columbus got 7 hits and St. Joe 6 hits, each team getting three doubles apiece and there were three errors on each side all of which were almost impossible to be otherwise.

The Columbus pitcher walked five men while Coby failed to pass a single man and the Columbus players had 22 foul balls registered against them to St. Joe's five, which aided Coby in striking out eight men.

Columbus started things off in the third inning by getting two men on the burlap and scoring two runs on a double. St. Joe then scored one run on an error by Columbus. Beams' double in the fifth and Coby's double in the sixth inning let in 2 scores each and gave St. Joe a five to two lead.

Columbus increased their score by one in the last half of the sixth but were unable to bunch hits enough at a time to tie things up for another chance before the ninth. Ridgway and Wade were the umpires. Coby and Sapp battery for St. Joe.

Elgin Curie is credited with an error when he let a fast foul thru him on the right field foul line, while acting as spectator.

MEMORIAL FUND DISBURSEMENTS

E. R. Kinsey, treasurer of the Memorial Day association reports a collection of $25.90 for the day and that he paid to Wm. Curie, expenses, $11.25 and to the band $14.65.

Mr. Myron Hoyt and Mrs. Loyd Hoyt and son spent a few days visiting with Mr. and Mrs. Howard Northrup, Mrs. Lela Northrup and Wm. Hamilton's. Mrs. Lela Northrup and son returned to Michigan with them for a brief visit.

A card from Mrs. Mabelle Thornton, gives their address at 1446 N. St., N. W., Washington, D. C. She reported that the family is nicely located and that she began her work in the census department Tuesday. Their many St. Joe friends wish them well in their new location.

JUDGE ENDICOTT GRANTS DIVORCE TO ILA SHILLING

Ila Shilling, of Spencer township, secured a divorce from Cecil G. Shilling in the DeKalb circuit court Saturday.

Mrs. Shilling claimed that her husband did not provide adequate support for his family, cursed her and became drunk habitually. The defendant did not appear, the state being represented by Richard W. Sharpless, prosecuting attorney.

Married March 4. 1914, the parties separated July 25, 1929. There are four children, Edward, 15, DuWayne, 13, Roy, 10, and Lyman, 6. Edward and DuWayne are in a home. Mrs. Shilling was given the custody of the two younger boys and the defendant was ordered to pay 4$ a week for their support.

SMITH—ULM

Tuesday at 4 P. M. at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Ulm of near Butler, occurred the marriage of their daughter, Flay, to the Rev. Hubert Smith, of Hanoverton, Ohio. Only the immediate family and intimate friends were present. The young couple will make their home at Sparta, O.

NEWVILLE TOWNSHIP LADY DIES

Mrs. Clara Meek, about 48 years old, wife of Sherman Meek, died at 11:55 P. M. Friday at her home in Newville township, two miles east of Coburntown, on the Spencerville road.

She had been ill for sevaral months from a complication of diseases.

The funeral services were held Monday from the Scipio Methodist Church. Burial was made in the Six Corners cemetery.

Mrs. Meek is survived by her husband; four sons, Kenneth, Forrest, John C. and Clarence, all of the neighborhood; and a daughter, Miss Luella Meek, at home.

What the Well Dressed Dartmouth Boys Wear

Here is an array of Dartmouth students showing how shorts may be adapted for wear on every occasion. The revolt against the conventional trousers is sponsored by the college paper. Many college athletes, including the football hero, Al Marsters, have come out "for the freedom of the knees." These students are showing how shorts may be worn for school, in the autumn, for afternoon wear, for study, for formal occasions, "pour le sport," for semiformal attire and for the campus.

Joan of Arc Ceremony in Orleans

With surplices and cassocks fluttering in the breeze and being dampened by a drizzle, high churchmen participated in a religious procession through the streets of the ancient town of Orleans, France, to commemorate the immortal Joan of Arc. In the background may be seen the historic cathedral of Orleans where the Maid is said to have paused for prayer.

JESUS IN THE SHADOW OF THE CROSS

LESSON TEXT—Matthew 26:1-46.

GOLDEN TEXT—He went a little farther, and fell on his face, and prayed, saying, O, my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me: nevertheless not as I will, but as thou wilt.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Proves His Love for Us.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus Suffering for Us.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—The Agony in the Garden.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Gethsemane.

I. Plotting the Death of Jesus (vv. 1-5).

Christ with divine insight predicted not only the fact of His death, but its time and manner. The Jewish authorities in secret conclave were plotting to silence His voice by putting him to death. In spite of themselves they were moving in the line of God's decree.

II. Mary of Bethany Anoints Jesus (vv. 6-13).

1. The meaning of the act (vv. 6, 7).

This anointing occurred when Jesus was at meat in Simon's house. Mary had the keenest apprehension of all the disciples. By sitting at His feet in loving fellowship, she obtained a grasp of truth which none of the other disciples had. She saw that His body was to be broken and that His precious life was to go out. She entered into fellowship with His sufferings and the joy of His resurrection.

2. The indignation of the disciples (vv. 8, 9).

The action of the disciples is in strange contrast with Mary's love.

3. Mary defended by Christ (vv. 10-13).

Jesus could not allow His most appreciative disciple to lie under this censure, so He came to her rescue. As a result of Christ's defense, Judas is so stingingly rebuked that he hastens away to betray his Lord.

III. Jesus Betrayed (vv. 14-30).

1. The bargain of betrayal (vv. 14-16).

Satan so completely had the mastery over Judas that he sold his Lord for the price of a slave (Ex. 21:32).

2. The betrayal announced (vv. 20-25).

While they were eating the Passover Jesus made this announcement. Who knows but that the reason for the announcement at this time was to give Judas an opportunity to repent? The sorrowful question in verse 22 indicates that the disciples did not seem to suspect one another, but directed personal attention to themselves.

IV. The Disciples Warned (vv. 31-35).

This took place as they walked from the upper room to the garden of Gethsemane. Jesus plainly told them, "All ye shall be offended because of me this night," quoting Zechariah 13:7 as proof. Though He told them of the darkness which was gathering, yet He gave them a glimpse of the coming light. He said, "After I am risen again I will go before you into Galilee."

V. Jesus Praying (vv. 36-46).

1. The place—the Garden of Gethsemane (v. 36).

Gethsemane means oil press. It was a place some three-fourths of a mile east of Jerusalem, where oil was crushed out of the olives.

2. His companions (v. 37).

Peter, James and John. The same disciples who had been with Him on the Mount of Transfiguration are permitted to go with Him into the deep shadow of the Garden. They slept, while He prayed.

3. Jesus sorrowing even unto death (vv. 37, 38).

The cause of His suffering was not primarily physical, but spiritual. The physical is not to be minimized, but the burden of sin—the world's sin—was pressing heavily upon Him. He was being made sin for us (II Cor. 5:21).

4. The prayer itself (v. 39).

"O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me." What was this cup? It was not prayer to be delivered from the cross. The idea that He desired to escape from the cross and thus stop short of His redemptive work is not to be entertained. Redemption through the sacrifice of Himself was the supreme purpose of His coming into the world. The holiness and perfection of His nature moved Him to shrink from the mountain of sin which was resting upon Him. Though the cup was bitter, He bowed in submission to the Father's will.

An Important Power

Man has one power in particular which is not sufficiently dwelt on. It is the power of making the world happy, or at least of so greatly diminishing the amount of unhappiness in it as to make quite a different world from what it is at present. The power is called kindness.—F. W. Faber.

On deck, early in the evening, they heard sounds of scuffling and shouting. The voices were too far off for any of the prisoners to hear what was said. But they knew some dreadful scenes of violence were being enacted, some such scene, perhaps, as that which had ended in Hallett's murder. Mrs. Radway spoke in a level, hard voice. She addressed her remarks to Crosby Todd.

"I suppose you realize by this time, what chance we stand if Doctor Waite has been killed?"

The thought that he had gone bravely to a doom which could not be averted, and had gone from a group of people who plainly did not trust him, was horrible to her. She had always esteemed ingratitude among the blacker sins, and now she was forced to accuse herself of it. It was strange, she thought, that the only thing he had ever given her was a loaded automatic pistol. But there was no other gift so welcome to her. Images of Metzger's grinning face came unbidden. She took the weapon from a drawer and counted its six cartridges.

Bettington was alone on the upper deck. He had plenty of steam. Drunk or sober, Kenzie was a good engineer and would have no shirkers. His history was curious. He had been an engineer on many ships, plying in many seas; but always he had been obliged to serve on vessels whose engines were worn out, whose machinery would invariably be on the point of giving way. Never in all his service had he shipped on a vessel whose engines were even passably good. Then, almost miraculously, he had been picked up by a man who knew his past misfortunes, held them club-like over his head, and brought to the engine room of the Albatross. It was not drink which made Kenzie weep when he saw the vertical, inverted, compound condensing engines, which took their steam from an Almy water-tube boiler. It was unbelievable joy. His dreams were realized. He was glad that Metzger, who knew next to nothing about marine engines, left him alone. No priest in the Gothic cathedral was more reverent than Kenzie before his charge.

Sam and Metzger, flinging all care aside, started gambling. Each knew the other had money. Metzger was the better player, but he was handicapped by a certain fear of any tricky play. Sam interspersed his games with anecdotes of men he had punished dreadfully for cheating. Interruptions such as these cramped Metzger's style of play. Sam was not going to be such good picking as he hoped. Sam's favorite form of punishment, it seemed, was semi-strangulation. It was a risky punishment, Sam confessed, because in the heat of the moment one might go too far. "An' you know it in a minute," Sam said. "There's something about a guy's face whose been squeezed a bit too hard, you won't never forget."

"Dio mio!" Metzger said petulantly. "Let us talk of something else."

"Anything you say," Sam returned. "Wot about?"

"There is only one subject," Metzger said; he kissed his hand airily and raised his black eyes to heaven: "Women!"

Sam reflected on this for a minute. It was not easily he shifted his base. This woman business had been settled hours ago, and he told Metzger so. They were to be kept in the fore part of the ship until Limon came in sight. It was only then that the services of the surgeon would be no longer indispensable. He chuckled heavily as he thought of the doctor's surprise.

"All in good time," Sam declared. "No use hurrying."

Metzger was annoyed when Antonio Pereira, the cook whose name was enshrined in literature, came in with a plate of the same sort of caviare sandwiches he had been used to make for Radway.

Pereira was in the mood to talk of his conquests which had ranged through many seas. Metzger, usually interested in such matters, wished only to be left alone with Sam. It was almost midnight before the cook turned in.

"There is a man like me," Metzger said. "He has no use for caution. I tell you women love that kind. He has lived, while you—" Metzger shrugged his shoulders. "Poor Sam!"

"What do yer mean, 'poor Sam!'" said the other irritably. Sam was stirred to indignation. He poured forth accounts of his amours. He grew almost eloquent. But he still told his friend that his agreement with the navigator must be observed for safety's sake.

Sam allowed Metzger to lure him on deck where they sprawled luxuriously on two great wicker chairs. Metzger set out to tempt his companion. Deliberately he sought to evoke images which should banish prudence. He pointed to the silhouette of Bettington's figure against the skyline in the distance.

"It doesn't worry me," said Metzger. "I'm all right, Sam. It's you I'm sorry for."

"Wot the h—l is it?" Sam said pettishly. By this time he understood that Metzger considered him one to be pitied. The idea revolted him.

"While he's up there—and he'll be there many hours—I know my woman is all right. But what do you know about the pretty little girl with dark flashing eyes? I'll tell you. She loves Hallett's nephew. They are young. You, my Sam, are old; you are cautious, you are slow. Is she going to wait for you when younger men offer themselves? How long will it take to get to Limon? I will ask. Wait."

He came hurrying back from the bridge.

"Seven days if the steam pressure is kept up. Let us say eight days. Eight nights like this to sit up here and think about her, Sam. Dio mio! If it were for her I longed, do you think I would sit waiting, waiting?"

Sam still fought for strength to resist this tempter. But Metzger's words were firing his blood.

"You've got to wait yourself," he retorted. "I ain't the only one."

Metzger laughed in scorn. He pointed again to the man on the bridge.

"I can afford to wait," he said. "There my rival stays. There he sleeps. But you! How 'Sparks' must laugh at you, Sam!"

"I'll break his neck," Sam said, licking his thick, dry lips.

"In eight days' time. Do you hear me? That is your revenge, is it, to give him eight days down there with her, while you wait for Costa Rica to come in sight."

Metzger burst into a peal of contemptuous laughter. The visions that were summoned by the tempter's suggestions awoke in Sam the desire to kill.

"The door's locked," he said. "It's steel and hard to get through."

"Why give yourself that trouble? The doctor there has the key in his pocket. He'll do well enough in the chain locker." Metzger saw that his words had fired Sam at last. "Of course, if you're afraid," he added, "well, then wait till we see Limon."

For a moment Metzger feared he was to be victim to Sam's sudden flaming anger.

"Afraid of what?" he snarled.

"Of the doctor's pretending he hasn't got the key."

When Sam scrambled to his feet Metzger chuckled. His careful plans seemed likely to work out. Metzger knew Sam's strength and brutal rages. Probably the doctor had no key; this Sam would not believe; inevitably there would come a fight and he did not think any man on board had a chance against Sam. And with the doctor removed his path would be easier. For the moment he concerned himself nothing with the ultimate destiny of the vessel. Petty cautions were nothing to him in such a moment as this.

Sam wasted no time in explanations. Like Metzger, he had forgotten caution and future dangers in his rage and jealousy. Bettington knew the intruder was dangerous.

"Give me the key," Sam commanded.

"What key?" Bettington asked.

"You know d—n well. I want the key to where the women are."

"I have no key," Bettington said.

Sam struck him across the mouth with the back of his monstrous hand. "You lie," he cried. "I'll have it, if I kill you."

Then, suddenly, without any preparation, Bettington struggling on deck with the enraged Sam. In a nearby chair Metzger in the moonlight watched eagerly.

Bettington dared not allow Sam to get those long simian arms about him. It was only the doctor's clever footwork and greater speed which enabled him to stem those savage rushes with continual jabs. He knew they would not win the battle for him.

He decided to change his tactics suddenly. There was a wrestling throw known as the "flying mare," which he had been shown by a Cornish miner in the Klondike years before. For its execution not only considerable strength was needed, but accurate timing was equally an essential. Sam could not have weighed less than two hundred and fifty pounds, while Bettington was some sixty pounds less.

The ferocity of Sam's attacks was astounding. When the first burst of the assault did not bring him victory, the sailor, sobering a little under the increasing pain of his bruised face, became more methodical. He saw that he must abandon this desire to beat Bettington to the deck with his flying fists and get a body hold.

It was while one of his accustomed habit channels was dammed for a moment by alcohol, and he paused for the fraction of a moment to think of a forgotten hold, that Bettington recognized his opportunity. With his right hand he seized Sam's left wrist, swung him around a little and then grabbed the sailor's right wrist while they were back to back, and then, with a mighty strain, leaned forward and flung him clear over his shoulder.

Sam fell with terrific violence, his head striking a rail. He lay there motionless, his head twisted queerly on its thick and sinewy pillar. The fate he had promised others was his own.

Metzger walked quickly over and looked down at the dead man.

"He forced it on me," Bettington exclaimed. "You are witness of that. I had no key."

Metzger looked at the doctor with a singular satisfaction.

"I saw you kill him," said he, "and I shall tell the others what I witnessed." He wondered how he could turn this to his own advantage. Accustomed to lying and suspecting others of dishonesty, he did not believe Bettington's words. Of course, he had the keys and would go below to be caressed and praised by Evelyn Radway for his victory. The thought was unbearable, enraging.

Metzger's knife flashed out. Nothing should keep the key from him. But as he raised the knife Bettington's fist caught him on the temple and knocked him down. Before he could regain his weapon the doctor had tossed it into the ocean. Metzger sat up on his haunches for a few seconds; he cursed himself for leaving the revolver below.

"Your life is worth nothing," he cried angrily, clambering to his feet. "In two minutes you will be as Sam is and I shall go down and console her for your loss."

Bettington watched him race down the companion calling loudly for help. Obviously two minutes seemed a liberal computation as an estimate of the doctor's life span.

He made what haste he could to the barred door and called for instant admission. To remain outside was to be killed. To join the imprisoned four offered immediate respite, even though it might be a brief one.

Mrs. Radway opened the door; he darted inside and barred it. She looked at him in horror. He had forgotten that his face was bruised and bleeding.

A moment later there was a confused sound of shouting and a fusillade of bullets struck the steel bulkhead.

"You see how perfectly they trust me," he commented.

He turned his head to see Crosby Todd hurrying toward him.

"They were after the doctor," Mrs. Radway said.

"I should feel happier if I thought that I was the only one needed," Bettington said soberly. He lowered his voice as he saw Mary and her brother. "They are outside ravening like wolves."

"Can they get in?" Evelyn Radway asked.

"I doubt it," he said, with an air of cheerfulness. "Not tonight, anyway."

To the four he was confronting the weather seemed suddenly to have become rough. There was a perceptible difference in the motion of the Albatross.

"She isn't steering," Bettington explained. "She's wallowing in the trough of the sea, but there's no danger yet."

"Why did you leave the wheel if you are the only man capable of taking charge?" Todd demanded.

"Because a dead steersman would have been equally useless. Don't you understand that they want to kill me? I confess I don't see why, unless it is they have discovered I'm bent on helping you. First Sam came at me and then Metzger tried to knife me. I don't think they knew I had changed the course."

He saw that Mary shivered at the mention of Sam. The thought of him had given her nightmare terrors.

"What reason did they give?" Todd asked. He was still convinced that there was an effort to dupe him.

"That they wanted the keys to this part of the yacht.'

Bettington turned to Mary and smiled. He had been able, after all, to do something for Tubby Unwin's girl. Not again would Sam menace her.

"Sam is dead," he told her. "Metzger is in command and swore to get help and have me killed. That's why I had to burst in here." There was something a little wistful in his tone. "I wish I could feel I was more welcome."

"You don't doubt my welcome, I hope," Mrs. Radway said gently.

He looked into her eyes with something of adoration. Surely no man had ever so grievous a prospect ahead of him. Her friendship heartened him.

"Thank God," he said, "I am sure of you."

The sight stirred Crosby Todd to indignation.

"You say Sam is dead," he remarked. "How do you know that?"

"Because I killed him," said Bettington.

CHAPTER X

Slivers to the Rescue

Of all those who made up the crew of the Albatross, none had been so thrilled with the day's happenings as Slivers. He possessed a boy's appetite for adventure. His earliest ambitions were directed toward a career of piracy, and in this, his fifth voyage, they seemed about to be realized.

Slivers had seen men die. He had crept on deck and looked, fascinated, at Sam, whose red face was white at last, and whose stubborn neck was bent at a horrifying angle. But Slivers had his doubts as to the final outcome of the struggle. Of all these men of blood and violence, he esteemed the prowess of the tall doctor most highly. Anyone who could have killed Sam with his bare hands. "He," said Slivers, thinking it over, "he's the guy for my money!"

If the amazing doctor should sally forth and overwhelm the rest, where exactly would Augustus Condon stand? That was Slivers' problem. Pirates, he had read, invariably met their doom swinging from a yard-arm over yawning black waters.

Slivers stole quietly from the door of Metzger's room and came stealthily to the one which had been so recently assaulted. Just the other side Bettington was trying to snatch some sleep; continuous tapping awoke him. Listening intently, he could hear his name spoken in a shrill treble. He threw the door open, pistol in hand, and saw Slivers.

"Ain't got nuthin' to eat, have yer?" Slivers demanded.

"No," Bettington whispered.

"I'll get some," said the boy jauntily. "Cook's in with the chief, talkin' about the skirts. Crazy about 'em. The rest is soused. They'll never get me."

He brought a ham already cooked, an Eden cheese and quantities of canned fruit and milk.

"Slivers," said Bettington, when he saw the loot, "what's the idea of helping us like this? What do you expect to get for it?"

The yard-arm, with its dangling victim, recurred. He was inspired with sudden cunning.

"If they knew, they'd kill me," he whispered. He cast about for a word. "I'm a neutral," said Slivers.

"You're the best little neutral I ever knew," Bettington said heartily, as he looked at the provender. "Where are you going now?" He had some idea of adding the boy to his company.

"Back to hear what they're saying." He shook his head wisely. "I'll come around agen tomorrer night."

Crosby Todd was the first to rise. He looked with astonishment at the provisions. In his first flush of gratitude he forgot that Bettington must have opened the door and been in communication with the enemy; this was soon to seem a very suspicious action.

At the same time, in the after part of the ship Metzger and Pereira faced one another. They had fallen asleep after hours of splendid planning. They had decided with enthusiasm to slay the doctor, the wireless operator and Bob Unwin as soon as morning came.

The morning came too soon; they had been scarcely two hours asleep when Kenzie awoke them. Already they were paying the penalty of the reckless mixing of drinks. Kenzie brought an enormous pot of coffee; he wanted to talk business. "What's going to be done?" he asked.

Pereira waved an arm impatiently. He did not realize that the Albatross was rolling gently in the trough of the summer sea. He was anxious for those delights which had been assured in Limon.

"A Letter for the Doc!" Said Slivers

"We waste time," he declared with dignity; "go as fast as you can."

Metzger sobered, saw things in a less happy light. In his mad anger toward Bettington he had forgotten that unless a competent navigator were discovered the Albatross must drift until another boat had seen her and reported her condition or proffered the help that would not be accepted. Mike could steer a course if it were set, but who was to set it?

Kenzie delivered an ultimatum. "I want to know if I'm to let my fires out or keep up steam."

"Go below," Metzger commanded. "I will let you know what is to be done."

Metzger convicted himself of gross stupidity. Why had he not applauded the surgeon for the death of Sam and so gained his whole confidence? Instead of this, his insane jealousy had cropped out. It had driven the doctor to the side of the woman he longed for. It had left the yacht without the one man who could find where shoals were and watch the charts for hidden dangers. When Slivers appeared with the omelette Metzger had decided on his course. The boy would do as a messenger to Bettington and the rest. They would hardly shoot him; if they did, little harm would be done.

He took a piece of the ship's monogrammed paper and scribbled a note. Pereira approved it and Slivers was used as the messenger.

When the cook's helper rapped at the door and, since was on a legitimate errand, dared to shout, it was Crosby Todd who cautiously peered through. Bettington was rigging up an electric stove in what had been Radway's room.

"A letter for the Doc," said Slivers Todd drew him in and shut the door.

"Where is it?" Todd demanded.

"It's for the Doc."

"I'll give it to him." Todd snatched it from him roughly. Instinctively he felt there must be something here which would give color to his suspicions. "It's all right," he said to Slivers.

Todd did not read it until he was out of sight. His eyes grew bright. Here was the evidence he needed to convince Mrs. Radway. Now she must abandon this stubbornly held faith. Allowing a few minutes to elapse he went back to the waiting boy.

"Doctor Waite will write an answer in half-an-hour. He says he must consider the proposition. Now run away for thirty minutes, son."

Slivers' message was received in the silence of deep gloom.

"What's he mean by that?" Metzger demanded when the boy had gone.

"She will not let him leave her," Periera said. "What else should it be?"

So busied was Bettington in wiring the little unconnected stove, that he did not notice the others were gathered in Mrs. Radway's room. Evelyn Radway knew from the triumph on Todd's face that he had some new winged barb for the doctor. She felt she had never detested anyone so much as this self-assured young man, upon whose words Mary and her brother hung.

"Mrs. Radway," Todd began, "you know our interests all lie in the same direction. In justice to us as well as yourself you wouldn't want to put confidence in anyone you knew positively was unworthy, would you?"

"Certainly not."

Mennonite Colony in America in Year 1662

Mennonites first appeared in America about 1662, when a band of 24, led by Pieter Cornelius Plockhoy, organized a settlement, but it was not until a century later that the cult became firmly established.

The settlement, which was one of the early plans for the occupation of the Delaware by any of the European sectarians, did not last. Plockhoy, with his 24 followers, made a contract with the Burgomeisters and Regents of Amsterdam, for the founding of a colony "in any part of the district of this Colonie wherever it may please to lie, as they shall be willing to cultivate and pasture."

After adopting various rules and regulations, the colony was broken up by the English under Sir Robert Carr in 1664, and nothing whatever is known of the fate of members of the colony. It is stated that Plockhoy, the leader, and his wife, arrived at Germantown in 1694, after having wandered in the wilderness for 30 years, and were given a home by the Mennonites at that place.

To "Turn State's Evidence?"

State's evidence is the evidence produced by the government in criminal prosecution. The term also applies to a person who gives such evidence. When a person implicated in a crime voluntarily confesses his share and gives testimony that will incriminate his accomplices he is said to "turn state's evidence," namely, he becomes a witness for the state. In such cases there is generally an express or implied promise on the part of the authorities that they will not prosecute the witness who thus testifies, or that he will at least be dealt with leniently. Prosecutors do not usually promise such immunity unless there is insufficient evidence to convict the defendant without the testimony in question. —Pathfinder Magazine.

Palm Sacred to Egyptians

The date palm tree is a sacred thing. For thousands of years it has been to the Egyptian fellahs and to the nomads of Africa the tree of life and the tree of death. Its dates are so nourishing that with frugal races they are a principal article of food. Upon its transparent bark was written, in ancient hieroglyphics, the first awakening of human thought. Its wood provided coffins for the old Egyptian tombs; its essences perfumed the wrappings of mummies.

Odor After Rainfall

Rain has no odor, but in falling purifies the air. Often rain is produced by electrical charges in the air, and these charges produce a gas called ozone which has a delightful fresh odor.

Tells her friends how to get whiter washes

"REALLY, dear, it's astonishing what a difference Rinso makes. I never scrub or boil the wash any more. In these rich suds clothes soak whiter than I could scrub them.

"My clothes last much longer now. And Rinso is all I use—no other soap, no softener. Try it."

Great in washing machines

The makers of 38 washers endorse Rinso. Cupfor cup, it gives twice as much sudsas puffed-upsoaps. Get the BIG package.

Milk for Soldiers

In the interests of the agriculture of his country, the Czech soldier will in the future be called upon to fight on milk instead of the traditional black coffee of the old Austro-Hungarian empire. It is estimated that the army will drink 75,000 liters of milk a day for breakfast. This measure has been adopted primarily to help the farmer, but perhaps the soldier will not object. He will at least know what he is getting, whereas the former guesses at the actual constituents of the army coffee varied from dried turnips and mangolds to acorns. It is said to have tasted like all three.

Neither buy or sell a friend.

Do the right the first time and make your mistakes afterwards.

It's sort of stylish now days to be informed that your are informed.

If you want to lose a hundred dollars and one friend—just loan him the money.

A pessimist is a man trying to collect his money and an optimist is the fellow that owes it.

Wars in Russia makes Bolshevics, warm weather makes flies, and hard times makes Scotchmen.

Go ahead. Disagree with yourself and agree with your neighbor and then see how things stack up for you.

Aren't women beautiful, when their looks and actions and their clothes and their neighbors all say so. Boy!

If gossipers had to use husking pegs to get into the ears of the world, that would simply increase the sale of husking pegs. That's all.

Come on protoplasm and proclaim to the world how you achieved perfection in qualifying to be able to condemn without being condemned.

Most men's success comes from two main sources—from the push derived from their own efforts and the pull of their friends. If you haven't got a pull—then push. If you haven't got any push, then it's just too bad for your relation.

It don't seem to make any differece if a fair damsel does succeed in finishing first in a beauty contest. "Lives of great men all remind us," that when the draw is made, men usually, conscientiously or unconsciously, rake off one that has a large number of convolutions in their grey matter.

The government ought to be called on to make further concessions from its prohibitory laws for the protection of the public, and establish a suicide foundry that would be a hand way for people to leave the world without going to the trouble of using speeding automobiles, marathon dances and bad whiskey to get them to another climate. It is suggested that the government manufacture whiskey to keep people from drnking whiskey of the bad reputation. Why not let the government go into the killing business?

Why be foolish in our accusations against certain executives in the affairs of our government, for the hard times that we say we are having. The depression is world wide. Over in Japan there is 1,000,000 unemployed, in England there are thousands idle and in every civilized country where there is an exchange of trade there is a pronounced lack of employment. The world has just over-lived, that's all. All we have to do is to sit down by the road side of progress and wait till we can catch up with ourselves.

Go to school twelve years of your sweet, precious young life and graduate from high school; go to Sunday School and church with your parents and grow up in the admonition and esteem of the best people of your community; marry the best looking girl in your home town; build a fine home with all the modern improvements; live on the best upholstered food that can be set on a table; read a library of books and grow up to be an educated man in whom the community looks up to as a finished product of intellectual refinement; run an automobile all your life without as much as running over your neighbor's cat; build for yourself a reputation in the business world as a sober and logical thinker AND THEN demonstrate to the big, wide, round, long-suffering world that you are not even dry behind the ears yet by supporting the wet element in their efforts to kill the dry law.

"In thine own effort find thy recompence."

Judas Iscariot hung himself and furnished his own rope.

Another real optimist is a duck that quacks when there is no rain in sight.

Any man is already better than the other man who maliciously criticizes him.

You might not have any short comings but might have some long goings that makes you act like that.

"My fate is in your hands," is one of the songs of the day. Well, fate isn't so bad as long as there is a meal ticket in the sentence.

There is no vulgarity in things happening in the natural things of ordinary life. Its the low down state of mind that lowers the natural to the cellar depths of indecency.

True friendship costs nothing but it enriches every person that has any thing to do with it. The world says: "Talk not to me of religions and creeds, Give us a friendship that knows human needs."

Our dear old friend Al Ca-po-na no doubt thinks that this country is a hunk of Ba-log-na judging from the way he is chased around from pillar to post. Whatever he thinks he will find that this country is not a land of spaghetti and special privilege.

"It's going to be good"—watching the wet element in the United States curb crime and lawlessness, restore the domestic tranquility of the nation, and prove to the American people that the national Digest poll was even greater than the north and south pole in significence, by repealing the prohibition law.

The talest building in the world has just been finished as the new home of the Manhatten Trust Company of New York. It is seventy-one stories high of 905 feet from pavement level to the top, or about a fifth of a mile upward. It might be alright to live high but it isn't exactly safe to have so many "stories" under you or about you.

By special dispensation of his eminence, George Cardinal Mundalein of the Chicago archdiocese permit was granted Catholics to eat meat on Memorial Day and the same will be granted for Independence Day which falls on Friday this year. Without making any unbecoming comments on other religions, we Protestants are well satisfied with the fact that we get our religion from the bible and not from human dispensaries. What's right today will be tomorrow. The bible cannot be changed by special dispensation of a single human being.

When all kinds of business is threatened or killed by chain store competition, then all the people who have not seen fit to see what it means at present will have the full realization dawn on them. It will look rather peculiar to see people return to the days of long ago when everybody went to the county seat for to get a tooth pulled, bank a dollar, get their mail, buy a milk pail or bury their dead. Why don't our merchants move to the larger places where they could meet up with and visit their neighbors and talk things over. There is food for thought as well as food for the stomach in this idea.

"Lives of great men all remind us," that during their lives they encountered opposition. During childhood their playmates jibed them about their ancestry, of their odd characteristics. In their teens they exhibited rare intellects in study which drew forth the sour grapes of their colleagues. In their twenties they enter the world's battles and draw the fire of organized vice. From there on all the powers of maltreatment and conspiracy are arrayed against him. When he dies the sob squads of both friends and enemies turn on their sprinklers, and join in solemn ceremony of respect of a departure of a great man who had the courage to be right rather than be agreeable. And with a voice full of tremor they say: "Here lies the bones of an honest man."

A late song is entitled, "I'm in the market for you." Now here is one purchase we make that we don't know how much we have paid until we are broke. Another song answers this, The price we pay is "We will be waiting at the end of the road."

Senator Borah says: "A radical individual of today believes in the Constitution of the United States and definitive Americanism." In the senator's speech before a large audience of young people, recently, he argued for action in the lives of young people of America in the earlier periods of their lives and pointed out the necessity of laying aside the fears that they were too young to think mature thoughts and do real things for the world in their present life. "Trust yourselves" he said for if you cannot trust yousselves when will the world be able to.

The Presbyterians voted against church union between the Southern Branch and the United Branch of the Presbyterian Churches at Charlottesville, Va., in a vote taken in the general assembly there May 26. Votes from 92 southern Presbyteries showed 37 for union, 29 against and 25 for postponing action, one not voting. Well, you can't blame the boys from a commercial standpoint. They are not apt to vote themselves out of a job. Wonder what the result would be if the congregations of these churches would be permitted to vote on this question? Let's get the Literary Digest to use a little straw on religion instead of booze. What say?

Sarcasm has always had a place in the world, even as an agency for good. It attacks the idleness and the hypocracies on mankind, it drives radicalism and shames men from their narrow mindedness into the broadfields of the green pastures of social reconciliation and good samaritanism. Sarcasm does not compromise. It uncovers and liberates the truth that has been buried in the depths of social procrastination and don't-careism. Sarcasism, like medicine, has its time for use but it has no time for play in a world where action is the cure for idleness, or where the let-well-enough-alone-ers set on progress to keep down the extra excitement that usually accompanies any progressive age.

Wind is a Close Second to Fire

In destuction and damage to property, high winds are almost as culpable as fire. A wind need not be of tornado force to do serious damage; nor is wind damage a hazard peculiar to any section of the country. Exceedingly high and dangerous wind movements have occurred in almost every section of the country and history will undoubtedly repeat itself. Windstorm Insurance is very moderate in cost.

Facts For Farm Folks

Written by YOUR AGRICULTURAL AUTHORITIES

PROF. W. B. KRUSEK.

ROTATE THE POULTRY

Diseases and parasites are one of the big problems of the poultryman. Soil sanitation can do much to eliminate these problems.

Rotating the hens and chicks on the farm is just as essential as rotating the crops. Most farmers have found crop rotation profitable but the hens have continued to inhabit the same soil year after year.

Poultry rotation means fencing and controlling the hens and chicks on the farm. Many farmers will object to this and the expense of fencing but they will find that controlling the hens and controlling the feeding will mean more profit from the flock and better quality of eggs for the market.

Before building any lot a definite plan should be adopted in order that a satisfactory arrangement may be obtained when finished. In some cases the farm garden may be placed in the rotation scheme. The garden cultivation will be good for the hens and the hens will be good for the garden provided they are placed in the garden a year before the garden takes possession of that plot.

If a plan can be devised where at least three lots are available and whereby the hens will never be on the same soil more than once every three years the rotation will be much more successful in fighting diseases and pests.

J. N. GEORGE FIGURES IN ACCIDENT

A party of Auburn people enroute to Indianapolis Friday figured in an automobile crash near Roanoke, Ind., but all escaped serious injury.

J. N. George of the Economy Cleaning company and his aunt, Mrs. Mary George, were in a Ford sedan driven by James Schull of Auburn, an employe of the Economy company. Mr. Schull also had his wife and two children, one a babe in the car at the time of the accident.

All were bruised and badly shaken up. Mr. George has a bad bruise over his right eye and his legs and arms received bruises. His aunt struck the lever which raises one of the windows in the automobile, broke it off and as a result she is nursing a sore arm. The Schull babe was thrown thru the window of the car door and alighted on the gravel road in front of the car. With the exception of a few scratches on the child's head it escaped serious injury. Mr. Schull, his wife, the children and Mrs. George are in Indianapolis and will return home later.

After the accident the Schull car was repaired and the party continued to the capital city. Mr. George came home Friday night.

A short distance from Roanoke a man driving a Chrysler car turned out from behind a truck and crossed the highway into a cemetery directly in front of the Schull car and the two vehicles came together. The Chrysler was quite badly damaged.—Star.

WATERLOO WIFE GRANTED DIVORCE

Paul E. Curie did not support his family, Jean E. Curie of Waterloo, testified in the DeKalb circuit court Thursday in getting a divorce.

After a married life of more than eight years, the couple parted last Jan. 3. There are two children, Robert, 7, and Junior, 8. The plaintiff was given the custody of the children by Acting Judge Willis Rhoads and the defendant was ordered to pay her $5 a week for their maintenance.

The defendant also was ordered to pay $50 for his wife's attorney's fee. She is represented by Rich-W. Sharpless. Attorney H. C. Springer entered an appearance for the defendant, but offered no resistance to the proceedings.

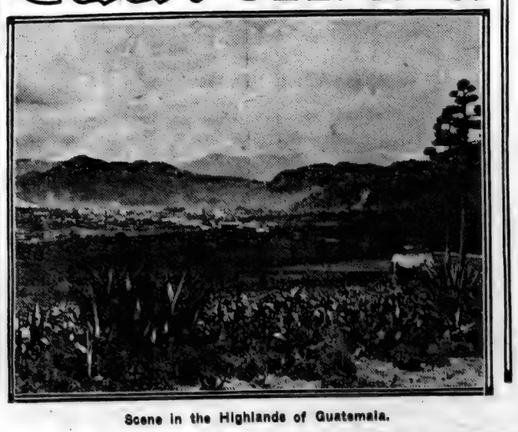
Guatemala



Scene in the Highlands of Guatemala.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

GUATEMALA, which has recently had a boundary dispute with its neighbor, Honduras, is one of the most progressive of the group of states that lies between Mexico and the Isthmus of Panama.

Three days' delightful steaming from New Orleans through the Gulf of Mexico and the western Caribbean takes one to the sun-kissed shores of Guatemala, where stately palms, stirred by perfume-laden breezes, wave in greeting.

The steady increase of American and other interests has opened one of the loveliest countries in the world, and the building of railroads is placing within easy reach the enjoyment of its natural beauties.

Most of the railroads are controlled by Americans. From Puerto Barrios, on the Caribbean, the northern road runs a distance of 224 miles up to the city of Guatemala, the capital. From here starts the Guatemala Central road, extending a distance of 74 miles to the port of San Jose, on the Pacific. The Guatemala Central railroad also has several hundred miles of road throughout the country. Recently a branch line 38 miles in length was put in service running from the city of Retalhuleu to Ayutla, on the border of Mexico, connecting directly with the Pan-American road there. It is now possible to travel by railway from New York city to the capital of Guatemala.

This country was for centuries the home of the Maya-Quiche Indians, whose history reads like a romance. Coretz, however, after the conquest of Mexico, desiring to extend his power over the country farther south, in 1522 sent an invading army under the command of Pedro de Alvarado to subjugate this powerful race.

Leaving Mexico with some 300 Spaniards and a great number of Mexican Indians, Alvarado fought his way into Guatemala, overcoming all who opposed him, and finally, on July 25, 1524, founded the first Spanish capital under the name of Santiago de los Caballeros (Saint James of the Cavaliers). And so it happened that, in a beautiful valley at the foot of two great volcanoes, "Agua" and "Fuego" (meaning water and fire), was firmly established the Spanish rule which was to last for nearly three centuries—that is, until September 15, 1821, when Guatemala became an independent republic.

First City Twice Destroyed.

This first Spanish city was, however, 20 years later, almost completely wiped out of existence by a great flood of water which poured down upon it from Agua. There has been much controversy among scientists as to the origin of this flood. Some claim it to have been the result of a cloudburst, others that it came from the crater of the supposedly extinct volcano. The former supposition seems to be most plausible.

The few survivors fled down the valley and at a distance of three miles chose the site of a new city, and, in 1542, courageously founded a second capital, now known as Antigua. In time it grew to have a population of 100,000 inhabitants, and became a great center of learning, with many universities, monasteries, and over a hundred churches rich in works of art. Although many times threatened by earthquake shocks more or less severe, it flourished until July 29, 1773, when, without warning, in one minute the proud city was leveled to the ground.

Again the survivors of this second calamity sought refuge farther away from the threatening volcano, and, at a distance of 35 miles, finally settled in the beautiful valley of Las Vacas. Here, at an altitude of 5,000 feet above the sea, surrounded on all sides by soft green hills, behind which loom the imposing heads of three volcanoes, lies the city of Gautemala, the present capital, founded by the courageous survivors of one of the greatest calamaties in the history of any land.

This typical city of Spanish America is a most interesting and charming place to visit. Coming directly from the land of skyscrapers, the first impression of it, with its low white buildings, is particularly attractive. Here and there is a house tinted a bright pink or a vivid blue, thus varying the monotony of the dazzling white and lending a sort of holiday-look, as though the houses had put on their best gown to welcome the stranger.

The climate is one of perpetual spring, the average temperature being about 70 degrees. The summer months bring the heavy rains.

With a population of about 120,000, the city of Guatemala is laid out on a scale, with broad avenues, fine parks, and handsome buildings. It is one of the best-lighted cities in America.

Scenes in City of Guatemala.

In the center of the city is the Plaza de Armas, with its pretty park, where stands a handsome statue of Columbus. This plaza becomes the rendezvous of fashion three or four evenings of the week, when an exceptionally fine band plays. There also each morning at ten o'clock a company of the President's Guard of Honor parades. Most interesting scenes are also witnessed on the nights of any national holiday or church festival.

The Indians come in from the surrounding country early in the day and install themselves in picturesque groups, selling native sweets, coconut water, and beautiful fruits. As night comes on they build fires which illumine their dark faces and brilliant costumes. The trees are hung with gay lanterns and at one side is stretched a great canvas upon which a free moving-picture show is in progress.

The band plays, and between times is heard the rather weird music of the marimba. This native instrument has a peculiar charm and, in spite of a certain metallic sound, not unlike a xylophone, when played in the open air has very beautiful tones.

The cathedral, which stands facing the plaza, with its two square towers, is a fine example of the churches of Spanish America. A curious but not unpleasing effect is obtained in the interior by the blue-and-white ceiling. All the churches of the city are rich in wood carvings, paintings, and antique altar silver saved from the ruins of Antigua.

Throughout the country wherever the churches have suffered from earthquakes and the crumbling towers are no longer strong enough to bear the weight of the heavy bells, these are hung out of doors under a pointed thatched roof held by bamboo poles, which adds greatly to the picturesqueness of the landscape.

The Teatro Colon, the national theater, is a building of which any city would be proud. It is copied from the Church of the Madeleine in Paris. It is generously subsidized by the government, and good operatic and dramatic companies come from Italy, Spain, and Mexico. Bull fighting is, of course, the favorite amusement, and there is a good bull ring.

To the west of the city stretches the broad avenue of La Reforma, a beautiful drive several miles in length, shaded by great trees and containing some fine statues, the most important being those of Gen. Rufino Barrios and Gen. Garcia Granados.

Antigua, by the Volcanoes.

In strange contrast to the modern city of Guatemala is the old ruined one of Antigua, well worth a visit. It is preferable to ride, although one can drive. The earlier the start after sunrise the better, for the road as far as the Indian town of Mexico presents a most attractive scene, as hundreds of Indians are jogging into the city heavily laden with great loads of earthen pottery, fresh fruits, and vegetables for the market. Mexico is picturesquely situated, nestling at the foot of the mountains and commanding an extended view of the great Guatemala valley, with the city almost at one's feet, and in the distance the sparkling blue waters of lovely Lake Amatitlan.

Leaving the high road one turns into a narrow defile, and up and down hill follows an old Indian trail, sometimes completely shut in, again widening with glimpses of the mountains as range after range rises to the imposing heads of three great volcanoes—Agua, Fuego, and Acatenango.

Nestled in a broad, fertile valley, the climate of which is unsurpassed, nothing can exceed this city of the past in solemn grandeur. Watched over by the giant Agua, which rises in one magnificent unbroken sweep to a height of over 13,000 feet, street after street stretches dazzlingly white in the brilliant sunshine. Not a sound breaks the silence which hangs like a pall over the place, and even the modern town of some 30,000 inhabitants seems dead, and a strange hush lies over all.

The quaint little pink hotel, with its flower-filled patio, the air heavy with the scent of roses, orange blossoms, and starry-eyed jasmine, is in keeping with the atmosphere of romance which pervades the place.

The SANDMAN STORY

THE EVENING PRIMROSES

EVENING was soon to come. As yet it was but twilight. The cool air spread itself over the flowers and whispered to them:

"Sleep, pretty dears, sleep and be refreshed."

The colors of the evening began to appear in the sky. There had been a splendid sunset.

It had been a sunset of such glory and beauty that it seemed as though the sun wanted to have a particularly glowing time before he went to bed behind the western hills.

Ah, such a sunset as it had been.

Just as boys and girls will want to end up the day with the jolliest and merriest and happiest of games or stories, so Mr. Sun had ended up his day with so magnificent a manner.

The Beautiful Evening Primrose Had Awakened.

And now the evening was on its way. The violet, purple colors of the night came stealing over the countryside and whisking into the woods and creeping down over the village streets.

Evening was bringing rest with it to so many. With its darkening colors it would make sleep come to those who were tired after the great efforts of the day.

It would be like pulling together the shutters so that the light would stay out, only this was so much better. This didn't shut out the cool, soft air of the evening.

This simply shut out the light. It was evening pulling together her shutters so that day would not disturb the sleepers and the weary ones.

And, as the evening came, moths and flyers of the night came dancing forth.

"Evening," they cried softly, as they flew about, "lovely, lovely evening."

Then a glorious fragrance filled the air and the moths gave little whirrs of delight.

They flew here, they flew there, they prepared their eager tongues for the great feast to come.

For the evening primroses had awakened.

Ever since the sun had gone down they had been slowly opening.

In the gardens the evening primrose relatives would open with a pop and a snap, and all of a sudden. But not so with the wild primroses.

They would unfold themselves slowly and little by little their perfume would waft itself upon the air of the night.

"Ah, how lovely you are tonight," the moths would whisper as they came to the banquets given by the evening primroses.

And the evening primroses would nod their gay yellow heads which the moths could see in the night dusk, and would answer:

"Oh, you little Moth flatterers. You little Moth flatterers."

"But it's true," the moths would answer.

The yellow primroses stood very straight. They were entirely happy.

Let others come forth in the sunlight. Let others see the dazzling beauties of the day.

But for them there was the evening. The cool, restful violet-purple colored evening.

They would never give up their time of being awake for any other.

After the summer got well on its way they would sometimes stay open during the day, but evening was their real time.

Now and again a sleepy little moth would fall asleep before his banquet was over and the primrose would cover him over with her lovely, comfortable petals as day came. He would be safe. The primrose would be very hospitable.

Things were both quiet and astir at night. There were many sleepers, of course, and there was a beautiful stillness in the air.

But there was a quiet kind of excitement about the evening, too—the winged creatures of the night who were about, the soft evening breezes, the silver beams from the moon, the gleams of starlight—all these were a part of the evening.

Oh, the evening primroses were in love with evenings. Then there were balls and banquets and then they gave of their perfume and hospitality to the creatures of the night.

STRUGGLE FOR LIBERTY

THE struggle for liberty forms an important chapter in the history of every nation. Such was the struggle of little Holland under William the Silent, and the revolution in France. In 1638 Scotland received her Magna Charta of civil and religious liberty, having won the liberty of conscience and freedom of worship as opposed to the divine right of kings. These form parallel chapters to important events in our own history when the United States fought battles under Washington for independence, and under Lincoln for a liberty which proclaimed the equal right of all men.

L. A. Barrett.

Decoration day has been set apart in memory of those who sacrificed their lives in the struggle of 1861-1865. The return of each Memorial day reminds us that many of our blessings come to us so easily that we scarcely appreciate their cost. Few have sacrificed for the blessings we now enjoy. Most of those who did pay the great price have passed away. Do we appreciate with any spirit of gratitude the tremendous cost, and the debt we owe to those who have passed on?

The spirit which won our liberty not only struggled through war and bloodshed, but also bequeathed to us a great trust to "carry on" through the infusion of high moral principles into our national life. These principles should interpret the words of George Washington uttered in his farewell address. Reason and experience forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in the exclusion of religious principles." Let our patriotism be like that of Washington and Lincoln—strong, true, conservative and sacrificial. This is the spirit which must meet every issue which threatens our liberty, a spirit which is willing to offer upon the altar of our country's need our most priceless possessions.

If the principles of our inherited democracy are to live, they must be protected and safeguarded by transmitting them to the children of our own generation and through them to the generations that are to come. Tell your children the principles of Washington and Lincoln. Let them catch something of their vision and life. If these principles abide our liberty is secure.

FAMILY DOCTOR LEARNED THIS ABOUT CONSTIPATION

Dr. Caldwell loved people. His years of practice convinced him many were ruining their health by careless selection of laxatives. He determined to write a harmless prescription which would get at the cause of constipation, and correct it.

Today, the prescription he wrote in 1885 is the world's most popular laxative! He prescribed a mixture of herbs and other pure ingredients now known as Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, in thousands of cases where bad breath, coated tongue, gas, headaches, biliousness and lack of appetite or energy showed the bowels of men, women and children were sluggish. It proved successful in even the most obstinate cases; old folks liked it for it never gripes; children liked its pleasant taste. All drug stores today have Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin in bottles.

MILL WORKER BENEFITED

Picked Up After Taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Towanda, Pa.—"I was working in a silk mill and got so tired and rundown that I weighed only 89 pounds. I was not well enough to do my work. As soon as I began to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, I began to pick up. After being married for thirteen years, I had a baby boy and the next year I had another boy who now weighs 37 pounds and is healthy as a bear. The Vegetable Compound has helped me in a dozen ways and I hope others will try it too."—Mrs. C. B. Johnson, Webb Street, R. D. #6, Towanda, Pennsylvania.

Dear Editor:

I SEE the dining cars are printing the waiter's name on each menu. Pretty soon they'll be labeling the porters. It will be a real shock to find that George's real name is Clarence or Wilford or Herbert.

Calling a porter Clarence wouldn't seem right. George is brisk and businesslike; but Clarence sounds too familiar.

I don't know that all this personality in business means anything. The worst job I ever had paid me $25 a week and I was sales secretary and was called mister. Later on when I found I could make $25 a day—some days—I didn't even carry a calling card.

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

THE DOCK AND NETTLE

IN FOLK-MEDICINE dock leaves are warranted a sure cure for nettle-stings. Sometimes children, when stung by a nettle, will place a dock leaf on the part stung, and say "In dock: out nettle-sting. Nettle stinged me! If you don't cure me I'll kill you."

The feature of interest in this superstition is the survival in it of that primitive idea which ascribed a "soul" to plants. To quote Marian Roalfe Cox again: "The logic of the untutored savage is simple but consistent. He observes that plants and trees, like animals, show undoubted signs of life and he reasonably attributes souls to them. For he can only interpret the actions of nature by putting them on a level with his own actions."

That was the logic of primitive man as it is the logic of the "untutored savage" of today. Among the ancients there was a distinction between tree worship and what might be called tree animism: between the tree regarded as a god and the tree regarded as the abode of a soul or spirit; though in some cases the line of demarcation is shadowy. While tree worship was enormously widespread, actual plant worship appears to have been extremely rare, and plant "animism" general. Various fortuitous reasons caused certain magical qualities to be assigned to certain plants. These were believed to exist in them along with their sentient qualities. For some reason the dock has, in folk-medicine, always been held to have a cooling effect. Perhaps the green leaf applied to an inflamed surface actually has such an effect: and this would be ascribed by primitive man to the action of the spirit of the dock plant. Bound on the wrist the dock leaf is still supposed to cure fever, and as in the present case the irritation caused by nettle stings. The child in applying his dock leaf threatens the dock spirit, and commands the nettle spirit, true to the form of his primitive ancestor who was accustomed not only propitiate but to cajole and to threaten in his dealings with the world of spirits.

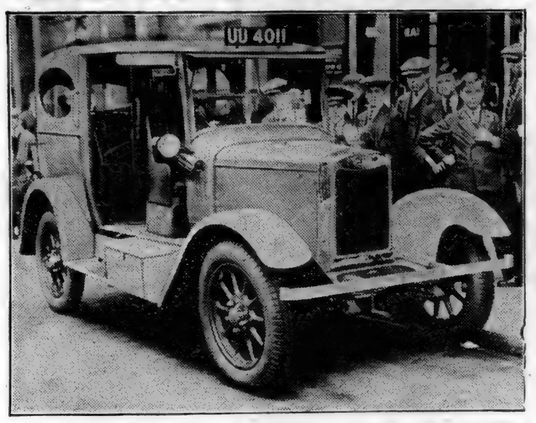
FLIVVER TAXIS MAKE THEIR APPEARANCE



The new two-seater taxi, with the safety-first sliding door, opening behind the driver's seat, which aroused considerable interest on its first appearance on the streets of the British capital.

BILL, THE BUS DRIVER SAYS

"Hitch your brain to the thing you're supposed to be doin'. If that thing happens to be operatin' a motor vehicle, tie it with a double knot so it won't pull loose."

(By MARCUS A. DOW.)

Everybody that is old enough to talk about the "good old days" may remember a homely sort of expression your teacher used when you was dreamin' instead of studyin'. She'd say, "Johnny, you're wool gatherin'."

There's no way of tellin' where such sayin's come from. They just spring up sort of natural like. We hear plenty of phony words today such as "He's nutty," meanin', the bird referred to is crazy, or "She knows her onions," meanin', of course, that there is a jane you can't put nothin' over on. Well, wool gatherin' was one of them wise cracks our grandmothers pulled when they wanted to tell somebody his or her mind was wanderin' around aimless like.

Accordin' to my best calculations there is at least 15,000,000 wool gatherers drivin' automobiles every day in this land of free thinkers and careless drivers. The records show, accordin' to the newspapers, 30,000 humans get killed—bumped off, annihilated or wiped out complete—and half a million get hurt—punished or contract drivin' pains—in automobile accidents every year.

A thousand different reasons, contributin' causes and what have you are responsible for this smashin' American tragedy. But way down at the bottom of most of the causes of these accidents is a main cause that can be described by a little old fashioned grandmotherly wise crack, viz.: The driver was wool gatherin'. Perhaps he was thinkin' about the baseball score or latest market quotation, or she was wonderin' if Mrs. Jones hat cost more'n hers.

Wake up, you dreamin' drivin' fools, before old man Bad Luck comes along and slams you one that'll end your drivin' career permanent or make you wish it had. Keepin' the mind on the job of drivin', no matter if it's a tin lizzie or a Rolls-Royce, is the most important safety rule in the catalogue! So get hep to yourself and stop this here wool gatherin'.

Modern Automobile Now Biggest Wealth Maker

The modern automobile is Uncle Sam's leading wealth maker as well as the world's foremost manufactured product. In addition to rolling up an annual wholesale value approximating $4,750,000,000, American-made cars pour more than $700,000,000 in wages a year into the pockets of workers, use the major part of 11,000,000,000 gallons of gasoline consumed annually in the country, and pay more than 35 per cent of the country's annual highway bill, which runs well over $1,500,000,000.

More than $2,500,000,000 was spent for road construction and maintenance in the United States during 1929.

During the ten years ending with 1929, motorists in the United States scrapped 15,195,000 cars, for which was paid $12,156,000,000, or an average of $800 apiece.

THE MOTOR QUIZ

(How Many Can You Answer?)

Q. In what countries must traffic keep to the left?

Ans. Great Britain, Hungary, Sweden and the Irish Free States.

Q. How does Germany rank in automotive exports?

Ans. Germany is now in sixth place. Before the war she ranked next to the United States and France in automotive exports. In 1928 Germany showed an increase of 71 per cent over the previous year in automotive exports.

Q. What is the first thing to do when front wheels "shimmy?"

Ans. Check for proper tire inflation.

Q. When a good engine shows a tendency to spit back on hard pulls or loses its speed and power for any length of time, what should be done?

Ans. Examine spark plugs first, then fuel lines and valves. A usual cure for this is changing to "cooler" spark plugs.

Ingenious Method of Holding Brake Pedal

A novel and ingenious method of holding the brake pedal while adjustments are being made on the brakes is shown in Figure 3. By setting the wrench so that it is fairly tight on the clutch pedal shaft, it will hold the brake pedal at any desired position so that the point is easily found where the brakes first begin to take hold.—Popular Science Monthly.

Point Adjusting Quite Easy If Car Is in Gear

One of the things that slows up the work of adjusting breaker points is the difficulty of turning over the engine until the points just open. It seldom can be done with the starter-motor, since the engine has a tendency to stop in the closed position of the points.

The hand crank is the usual way of doing the job, but sometimes the owner does not have his crank handy, and getting it out at best is always a nuisance. In repair shops, therefore, they have figured out a way to accomplish results with a minimum of delay and effort.

The trick is to place the car in gear, with ignition off, and move it a little, forward or backward. This turns the engine very slowly until the points break.

Usually in their open position the points should space somewhere between .015 and .020 inch. It varies somewhat with different makes.

Several Important Hints For Automobile Repairs

Here are several important precautions for car repair work. One, disconnect a lead from the storage battery while working. This prevents anyone from starting the engine. Two, use blocks under a wheel, to avoid the axle toppling off a jack. Three, watch out for gasoline. A broken extension light may produce a spark which will ignite the gasoline. Four, do not hold the head directly under the work in hand. Dirt in the eyes or a slipping wrench striking the face may result. Five, use gloves as far as possible when handling piston rings. Ugly cuts can result from sharp edges. Six, take no chances with light chain or rope garage hoists. Seven, put good blocking under the raised axle.—Science and Invention.

THEIR ELOPEMENT PROVED A FAILURE

(© by D. J. Walsh.)

MARY ELLEN was running away with her father's best friend. She felt warm and excited in her new blue suit and she gazed demurely straight ahead at the road that was unwinding before them.

"Happy, Mary Ellen?" her companion queried, smiling fatuously at her. He was florid and somewhat stocky and his eyes held a too bright gleam.

"Yes, Mr. West," Mary Ellen agreed respectfully.

"But you promised not to call me—Mr. West, little Honeybunch," he chided her.

"Oh! yes," Mary Ellen sighed. "But you see I've called you that all my life. It—it doesn't seem exactly respectful to call you—John."

Mr. West laughed loudly.

"You'll get over all that when you're my wife and mistress of a farm—you'll be mistress of two farms when your old man cashes in."

Mary Ellen was silent, a vague hurt creeping beneath her ribs. She didn't exactly like Mr. West to talk about her father like that.

She wondered if she would like being married. It had been rather fun lately to have Mr. West bring her boxes of candy and smile at her as if she were chocolate cake or peach ice cream. It would be fun, too, to play with his children. Jack was just a year older than herself. It had been lonely at her home with her folks so strict and not letting boys come to see her. Father had laughed and mother had smiled at Mr. West's boxes of candy. She wondered what they would say when they knew she was really married.

"Only ten miles farther to this here town where we're going to get hitched up," Mr. West orated, sending his flivver forward with a little burst of speed.

Mary Ellen jumped. She had been looking at the pretty houses they were passing. She was sorry the ride was almost over.

Mr. West somehow did not appear as much a man of the world in the city as he had up on the farm. He didn't know in which direction the city hall was, and when he inquired of a traffic cop he winked at him and tried to be funny.

At the city hall an old-maidish looking woman surveyed them keenly and asked a lot of senseless questions.

"How old are you?" she queried of Mary Ellen.

"Eighteen, come last June," Mary Ellen replied promptly.

The woman yanked the sheet out of her typewriter with a jerk.

"I can't issue you a license—you're too young. Have to be twenty-one."

Mary Ellen thought that the woman's eyes rested upon her rather pityingly. It wasn't as if she were sorry about her not getting married, but as if she were sorry about something else.

A man whispered something to Mr. West as they went out.

"Go over the border. The age over there's eighteen."

Mary Ellen sighed. She was getting tired, and she had thought that what the woman said would settle the matter and she wouldn't have to get married.

After all marriage might not be as pleasant as people hinted by laughs and winks.

They scuttled along over bumpy roads, and after asking the way several times located an ivy-covered court house.

Another couple were there ahead of them. The girl was just a little older than Mary Ellen, but the boy was very different from Mr. West. He was tall and straight and sun-tanned, and when his blue eyes rested on the girl they lighted up like church windows.

Mary Ellen suddenly noticed how very red Mr. West's cheeks were and how his eyes were imbedded in little puffs of fat. His coat sagged where the boy's shoulders held his nice and straight.

Mary Ellen felt slightly sick when Mr. West marched up to the clerk and button-holed him with a smirking grin.

"This little lady and I want to get a marriage license."

Mary Ellen's hands were like ice. She responded "eighteen" very faintly, and when the clerk accepted her age without comment her heart sank to her toes. She had begun to hope that maybe this clerk would object to her age, too.

"How long a resident?" the clerk asked a second time.

Mary Ellen stared dumbly.

"He means how long you've lived here," Mr. West explained, jocosely. "We just come, suh."

"Sorry—have to be a resident of the country for six months," the clerk regretted with a sympathetic smile.

Mary Ellen's knees were knocking together when she left the courthouse and Mr. West's ardor was slightly dampened.

"What—what are we going to tell your folks if we go back not married?" Mr. West questioned her weakly.

For the first time Mary Ellen rose to the occasion. Not for nothing had she read her initial best seller a month ago.

"Tell them we came to dinner in town and had tire trouble," she improvised. "And—and you might as well get me the dinner, for I'm hungry."

She was all of a sudden gloriously happy that she was not getting married and could still look for a hero like the blond bridegroom at the court house.

Mr. West, reflected Mary Ellen, tired and got peaked-looking easily. Probably he'd better look for a heftier woman to run his farm and handle his young 'uns.

Plane Far Outclassed by Feathered Marvels

In flying efficiency the bird is far superior to the most modern plane, though the bird wastes considerable energy in its aerial journeys, while the plane wastes none.

The bird's forward motion of the wing after the downward stroke is an uneconomical way of applying power, because the stroke is wasted, and the air friction increased. As a result, speed is retarded. On the other hand, the propeller of a plane has no lost motion.

Yet less than two ounces of fuel in the form of fat is sufficient to carry a small bird at a high rate of speed over a course or 2,400 miles, according to scientists. A thousand-pound plane, if as economical of fuel, would consume only a pint of gasoline in a 20-mile flight instead of many gallons.

A vulture or crane, after a few preliminary wing beats, is able to accomplish something beyond any plane yet invented. Setting its wings, it is able to mount in sweeping circles to a great height, overcoming gravity without exertion. Both the soaring and sailing birds are proficient in the use of several factors in the art of flying that have not been mastered in principle or practice by the most skilful aviators.

The size of the wings seems to make no difference in the migratory flight. Though the Carolina rail has small, short wings, apparently ill adapted to long journeys, it crosses the Caribbean sea with ease. The humming bird, whose wings move so fast they cannot be seen, crosses the Gulf of Mexico, a distance of 500 miles, in a single night. In fact, birds with small wings, with the exception of the rail, are invariably faster than their long-winged consorts.

The humming bird is capable of a trick that probably never will be met by the plane. When extracting the nectar from flowers, it finds it necessary to fly backwards. Nature still maintains her supremacy in the air over man.

First to Use Coal Oil

The first to introduce the use of coal oil, or "kerosene," in the United States and Canada was Dr. Abraham Gesner, a distinguished Canadian geologist. Doctor Gesner, after long experimentation, discovered how to produce oil that could be used in lamps for illuminating purposes, from bituminous shale and cannel coal. Though he gave the name "kerosene" to his discovery it was popularly called coal oil.

Following the discovery of petroleum in Pennsylvania in 1859, and later in many other sections of North America, kerosene became the principal product of the distillation of the crude oil. Like most inventors, Doctor Gesner reaped little financial benefit from his discovery, which was destined to be the foundation of scores of immense fortunes.

Tobacco in History

The tobacco plant was taken to Europe in 1558 by Francisco Fernandes, who had been sent by Philip the Second of Spain to investigate the products of Mexico. Jean Nicot, the French ambassador to Portugal, sent seeds of the plant to the queen. The services rendered by Nicot in spreading a knowledge of the herb have been commemorated in the scientific name of the genus Nicotiana. While the plant came to Europe through Spain, its use for smoking purposes spread to the continent from England. Ralph Lane, first governor of Virginia, and Sir Walter Raleigh, who first used it as smoking tobacco, introducing it into England.

Might Be Trained to Return

A new dollar bill was recently put into circulation to find out how much work a dollar does. Attached to the bill was a note asking each successive holder to write down the transaction for which he used the money. In 14 days the dollar changed hands 26 times as follows: Five times each for salary, tobacco and cigarettes; three times for candy, two times for men's furnishings and shaves, and one each for automobile accessories, bacon, garters and tooth paste.—Wall Street Journal.

Made Shad Roe Popular

Sixty years ago, customers of New York restaurants considered shad a delicacy but there was little demand for the roe. This state of affairs was changed, however, when a chef went to market one day, saw the roes tossed aside, bought some and prepared them with green peas and a mealy potato as a special dish, which sold for 25 cents. The dish took the fancy of the customers and became a Friday feature.—Detroit News.

Fish and Game Club Information

Fisheries: The present season bids fair to be the best in several years for the spawning of fish in public waters. The condition of the streams, as well as the lakes, has been ideal. With the exception of a few cold days which did perhaps some but not extensive damage, the weather has been fair and of sufficient warmth. There have been no general floods, freshets or high waters. The bass are now spawning in all sections of the state. Ten days more of fair weather and we can predict an exceedingly large hatch for 1930, and consequently a good fishing year in 1933.

At the hatcheries also, the spawning is proceeding in a fine way. Some of the bass have finished, with the result that delivery of fingerlings will be commenced early in June.

The Riverside and Tri-Lakes hatcheries broke all records in April and May when they hatched and distributed 16,270,000 pikeperch fry, and 4,345,000 yellow perch fry.

From April 1st to May 17th the crews engaged in removing undesirable fish killed 2127 gar pike, 173 dogfish, and 771 carp. These figures amply justify the beginning of this work early in the season. We have received much favorable comment on this project.

Propagation of Game Birds: At this writing very few ringneck pheasant eggs have been distributed to the several applicants. It is impossible to state when the game breeders from whom the eggs have been purchased will be able to make shipment. Delivery may be expected, we hope, within a short time, since late eggs are not so good.

At the Brown County Game Reserve good progress has been made in the propagation of pheasants and wild turkeys considering the late start. On May 23, there were in the brooding pens 340 young pheasants and 58 young turkeys, with 182 hens incubating pheasant eggs, and 12 hens setting on turkey eggs, and 4 hens on wild duck eggs. Several hundred more eggs remain to be incubated. On May 24, eighteen laying pheasant hens and 3 cocks were liberated at Turkey Run State Park. On May 28 a like number of hens and cocks was liberated at each of the two other state parks—Spring Mill and Shakamak. This was with the hope that these birds will nest in a wild state.

Warden Service: In April there were 182 arrests by wardens, resulting in 176 convictions, with 5 cases pending and one dismissed. Among the offenses were 73 for use or possession of nets, spears, or traps, and 67 for hunting or fishing without license. The amount of fines and costs was $3,891.85.

Mussel Regulation: The Conservation Commission has made a regulating, to be effective July 15, 1930, prohibiting the taking of mussels for 5 years in the following waters: Yellow river from Plymouth to the west line of Marshall County; Wildcat creek from its mouth to Cutler; Eel river from Logansport to the east line of Cass County; and from Roann to North Manchester; Tippecanoe river from state road 31 to the east line of Marshall County; Pigeon river within Lagrange County; St. Joseph river from Fort Wayne to the north line of Allen County; Elkhart river from Waterford to Elkhart; East fork of White river from Columbus to the south line of Bartholomew County.

IT IS SO

Let us philosophize. I have pondered over this—that women, especially mothers, are more faithful in religious services than men. I am uncertain that women are more religious than men, perhaps they are not, but they are more devoted to the public services, from whence a goodly portion of our religion is supposed to emanate.

Today, for instance, I saw a mother of three children holding the most mischievious one of them fast on his back in the pew with one hand, taking communion with the other and praising God in her heart.

Now if that refractory boy ever arrives at martyrdom and the martyr's reward, he will owe as much to his mother's main strength as most of us do to grace.

It is not for me to determine just what prompted the almost superhuman display of divine energy. It may have been a mortal fear that the boy was headed toward the wrong goal and that nothing but force, immediately applied, could save him from inferno. It may have been a holy glimpse of what a boy can be who starts and stays right. Or it may have been a vision, an aggravating, lingering vision, of the boy's father, last seen beside the cooking range, with a hungry look that called for an early, full dinner, or trouble. Anyhow the mother did it—did it with a grace and courage strictly feminine—a mystery into which angels should desire to look.

Yes, I have pondered, vainly pondered, for these are problems too ponderous for our age. Wait till that boy attains to his father's place by the cooking range. Ask him. Doubtless he may know all about it.

CHARLES E. COUGILL
THE BEAUTY OF NATURE

More and more every day people are beginning to realise that a few beautiful flowers often add " that one necessary touch" to make the home artistic and attractive.

There is no concern in this section that has done more in this community to further the general use of Potted Plants and Cut Flowers than THE COUGILL GREEN HOUSE at Auburn.

At COUGILL'S GREENHOUSE you will always find a large and attractive Stock of Potted Plants and Flowers of all kinds growing and in a hardy condition. This display at all times would compare favorably with that of similar establishments in the larger cities.

They make a specialty of Designs for Parties, Weddings, Funerals, Lodges, and Receptions. Prompt and satisfactory attention is given to all Mail Orders.

Another feature of this most modern establishment is the Large Assortment of Flowers and Vegetable Plants of all kinds that are Hardy and Thrifty and ready for transplanting to everyone, the Farmer, Gardener and City Gardener by purchasing the plants from this concern have done away with labor, trouble and uncertainity of planting from the seed. They have a large number to choose from and at Prices Most Reasonable.

No matter what the occasion may be that demands flowers, you will be pleased both with the High Grade Stock and Eminently Satisfactory Service you will receive from this floral establishment.

Another feature of COUGILL'S GREENHOUSE is the large variety of Nursery stock and their landscape gardening. The Nursey and Landscape business requires considerable capital as well as a wide range of ability and experience. MR. COUGILL has been in the business practically all of his life and is thoroughly conversant with all the branches of the business.

Here you will find a wide variety to select from. All kinds of Apple, Pear, Peach, Cherry, Plum, Quince, Nut and Shade Trees, Climbing Vines, Roses and Shrubery. These are kept in a healthy and sturdy condition so that they arrive at your place in excellent condition for planting.

They are practical Landscape Gardeners and are able to give valuable suggestions as to kind and number of Trees, Plants, Shrubs and Flowers necessary to make your grounds a veritable paradise.

When it comes to this class of work, the reliability and nearness of COUGILL'S should be considered and we advise all our readers to consider very carefully before having anyone else do their landscaping.

We take pleasure in referring to COUGILL'S GREENHOUSE at Auburn as one of DeKalb County's progressive industries.

SANDERS MAYTAG COMPANY
THE MAYTAG IN COUNTRY HOMES

In past years every known convenience has been invented to lighten the work of man. Inventions for the housewife ,were slower in being perfected. However, today, there is offered the women of this section an invention which really gives her an extra day in the week, a MAYTAG WASHER.

The MAYTAG WASHER, sold in this section by the SANDERS MAYTAG COMPANY, West Eighth Street, Auburn, Phone 9, is without a doubt the most popular and therefore the best washer on the market today.

Years ago the Maytag Company started to make washers, and it has only been in recent years that people fully appreciated the convenience of the MAYTAG WASHER. Today the Maytag Company, the largest washing machine company in the world, ships MAYTAG WASHERS by the trainload.

Most people think of the necessity of electricity when Maytag Washers are mentioned. Not so, for the MAYTAG GYRAFOAM WASHER is equipped with the famous MAYTAG MULTI-MOTOR which operates on gasoline.

The Maytag Multi-Motor develops three-fourths horsepower. It is air-cooled and equipped with high tension flywheel magneto, light in weight, compact, thoroughly reliable.

Has large fuel tank, new improved foot starter, easy to operate, extremely simple, and over 200,000 in successful operation. The standard base makes the multimotor and the electric motor interchangeable.

Just call the SANDERS MAYTAG COMPANY, at Auburn, and a free demonstration in your own home will be gladly given. If you so desire they are sold on easy terms with 52 weeks to pay. Give them a call and you will thank us for calling your attention to the Maytag in this Farm Edition.

C. F. BURGOYNE SONS HARDWARE
GOOD EQUIPMENT MAKES A GOOD FARM BET TER

The success of the Farm Implement Establishment of THE BURGOYNE SONS HARDWARE located at 160-162 E. High St., at Hicksville, Phone 339, may be explained by the efficient and satisfying service it is rendering to the farmers of this community.

Believing in the great agricultural possibilities of this flourishing community, the organizers of this company determined to establish a business that would meet every demand of the farmers in the way of Farm Machinery and Farm Implements. As a result no firm in this part of the country is better equipped to meet the needs of the farmer, whatever they may be. The standard lines they carry, the honesty of their dealings and their efficient business methods have built for them a reputation not limited to this particular vicinity or county. The BURGOYNE SONS HARDWARE is better known to the farmers of this and adjoining counties than any dealer in any town in this section of the State.

THE BURGOYNE SONS HARDWARE carries "Everything for the Farmer," McCormick-Deering Lines Harvesting Machines, Tillage Implements, Plows, Binder Twine, Feed Grinders, Genuine Repairs, Hay and Corn Machines, Manure Spreaders, Wire Fencing, etc. These are all specialties with this firm and represent the most modern and scientific developments in the line of Farm Machinery and Farm Implements.

Not only the fine quality of the line this firm carries but the unfailing courtesy and consideration shown to the farmer here, makes this firm popular with them. The "Farmer Be Pleased" has always been the slogan of this establishment. They also carry a complete line of Hardware and Tires. They are also dealers for the Atwater-Kent Radios.

THE BURGOYNE SONS HARDWARE do more than merely sell the farmer a piece of machinery or implement, they have a service department that watches the particular implement and machinery until it is proved that it will give satisfactory service. They are assisting the farmer to take and keep his rightful place in the community and are doing their part toward having every acre of tillable land in this section produce its maximum which insures prosperity to the farmer.

THE BURGOYNE SONS HARDWARE, at Hicksville, is the headquarters for the farmer who comes to the city for a day or the part of a day. The management is always glad to have the farmers call and every effort is put forth to make them feel welcome here. While on display are the latest models of the most scientifically improved Farm Machinery and Farm Implements.

The members of this firm well merit the high place they hold in the community and the confidence of their many patrons. They are men of integrity and business dealings of the highest character.

ALBERT SMITH AND SONS
EXPERT PLUMBING AND SHEET METAL WORK

ALBERT SMITH & SONS at Hicksville, Phone 218-02, makes it their business to put and keep the plumbing system of your house in order.

The plumbing system of a home is similar to the circulatory system of the body. If our circulatory system is out of order we need the attention of a Specialist. If the plumbing system of a home is defective it is cheaper to call on a Specialist in the Plumbing line and one that knows his business.

SUNSHINE BAKERY
A PROGRESSIVE INSTITUTION

We eat bread every day and should know how our daily bread is made. Yet how many of us know how and under what conditions it is made. If it is made of the proper ingredients and in a Clean Sanitary Baking plant.

The manager of THE SUNSHINE BAKERY, South Broadway, Butler, Phone 229, invites your inspection of the plant at any time. When you buy Purity Bread you are buying Quality. All bread is not alike, the quality depends upon the kind of material used, the skill of the Baker and the equipment with which he has to work. Purity Bread is your guarantee that all these requirements have been met. Purity Bread is made under Sanitary conditions from the very best of material and by a Baker who knows how.

THE SUNSHINE BAKERY at Butler, could make cheaper bread by using cheaper material but they could not make Purity Bread, and the manager believes that Quality counts in the long run. Nothing is too good to use in making Purity Bread.

Be sure of getting good bread by asking for Purity Bread, sold by all the leading grocers and restaurants in Butler and surrounding territory. Purity Bread contains the best material that can be bought, compounded scientifically, made with automatic exactness and baked perfectly, Crisp, Fresh, Wholesome and Nutritious.

HICKSVILLE IRON AND METAL CO.
A NECESSITY IN EVERY COMMUNITY

The establishment of the HICKSVILLE IRON & METAL CO., at Hicksville, Phone 187, is one of the busy places where trading in all of its departments is carried on with promptness and dispatch.

While some of the articles that are purchased by this concern may not seem important, yet it is necessary to have an outlet for them and the people of this section are fortunate in having an establishment of this kind so efficiently managed.

The HICKSVILLE IRON & METAL CO. has always been known for their honest and straightforward methods and their very fair dealings with everyone who visits their place and consequently their establishment adds much to the efficiency of this section of Indiana as a trading center.

They buy everything in the junk line from a Threshing Outfit to Scrap Iron, Second Hand Pipe, Rags, Paper, Automobile Tires, Brass, Copper, Zinc Old Automobiles and Building Material.

The HICKSVILLE IRON & METAL CO. furnishes the people of this community a market for their Furs, Hides, and Tallow, for which they pay the highest Market Price. They also buy second hand machinery, pipe gas wells, in fact "Everything and Anything." MR. J. A. CROWL, the manager, endeavors at all times to please his patrons but there are instances where his employees are not as particular, in such cases he asks his customers to overlook these occurrences and excuse him. He wishes to thank the farmers for the many favors they have shewn him in the past.

The News in the past has had very pleasant business relations with MR. CROWL and we take pleasure in presenting to our readers such a man of high character, integrity and fair business methods.

Cornstalk Shaver

One effective method of controlling the European corn borer is to burn infested cornstalks some time before May 15. The stalks must be broken or cut off at ground level and raked into piles or windrows. It is important to destroy all the stalks, stubble, and trash. Winter poling —dragging a heavy log or railroad iron sidewise across the field to break off the stalks—usually leaves many firmly rooted in the ground. To rake clean, the stalks must all be cut free. The U. S. Department of Agriculture has developed a simple stalk shaver. It is described in Miscellaneous Publication 69-M, Construction of a Sled-Type Cornstalk Shaver. This publication, which tells how to make the stalk shaver, may be obtained from the Department of Agriculteure, Washington, D.' C.

SACRAMENTO, Cal. — The largest aeroplane ambulance in this country will be tested in April. It will accommodate six passengers.

Puzzling

"Lapland is the most thinly populated country in the world," says a contemporary. It doesn't say how many Lapps there are to the mile. —The Passing Show.

WOMEN WIN; WON'T SERVE

COTTER, Iowa — The 180 qualified voters of this town may have to have a new election because women refuse to serve. At a recent election the only ticket included no women. At a mass meeting the women clover or bur clover plants. From 250 to 500 pounds of soil per acre is the usual application. In some cases a mixture of equal quantities of inoculated soil and seed has given good results. This involves less labor and expense, but is not always quite as sure to bring good results as the heavier application of soil. Moistening the seed with water to which has been added a little glue, with the seed, has in some cases resulted in satisfactory inoculation. Inoculation is also accomplished by means of artificial cultures.

LARSON AUTOMOBILE SERVICE
A REAL SERVICE STATION

Every locality has among its people, men who thoroughly understand their business and the vicinity is fortunate in having in its midst a man "Who Knows the Auto Game." We refer to Mr. Larson of the LARSON AUTO SERVICE, Hicksville, 108 N. Maple St,, Phone 393.

The LARSON AUTO SERVICE has become very popular with the automobile owner, as the fact has become known for miles around that they have mechanics of ability. No job whether overhauling an automobile or a tractor is too tough for them to handle and when they have finished their work the owner of the machine is satisfied both with the quality of work done and the price charged. They have always been honest and fair with their customers.

MR. LARSON can tell you immediately what is wrong, how long it will take to fix it, and the probable cost. If it will pay you better to get a new part he will promptly tell you so. He is able to repair all makes of machines and makes them good as new.

The LARSON AUTO SERVICE is noted for the first-class work they turn out and the reasonable prices they charge. In fact their Garage is a real service station.

After you have spent your time, patience and money in having your valves ground two or three times and then the first time you drive it you find that it still has a good percentage of that sluggishness and lack of Pep, Have You Ever Asked Yourself WHY? It comes from improper grinding of your valves. To give your engine the pep of a New CAR requires the use of the Factory Method of reconditioning the valves.

We take pleasure in recommending this Auto Service Station to our readers and to say that they are Reasonable in their prices and Reliable in their work.

They are the distributors in this section for the FRIGIDAIRE Electrical Refrigerator. This is a product of the General Motors Company and is in popular demand in both city and country.

The Frigidaire can be hooked to a Delco Light Plant as well as onto a regular Electric Current. Also the new Frigidaire is now fitted with an automatic device by which you can regulate the temperature in the freezing compartment, at your will.

Further, WIDNEYS are experienced plumbers. They carry a complete line of plumbing fixtures, and no matter whether it is only a small job of plumbing, or the complete installation of the plumbing system in your house, they will do it for you in the most efficient and satisfactory manner.

MR. WIDNEY is very courteous and will be pleased to assist anyone with their plans.

The News compliments them upon the prominent position they have obtained in the business life in this section and upon the modern and satisfactory work which they execute, and on being one of the most complete Sheet Metal Establishments in this section of the State.

IDYLMERE DAIRY

DAIRY PRODUCTS OF QUALITY

Perhaps in no other channels have greater strides been made in recent years than in the practices, methods and services of the Modern Dairy Companies in furnishing the public with Clean, Wholesome, Certified Milk, Cream and Other Dairy Products.

This in no small measure is the result of the many improvements and progressive spirit shown by the leading Dairies in installing new, scientific equipment.

One of the leading dairies of this section of Indiana is located at South Broadway, BUTLER, Phone Black 140, the IDYLMERE DAIRY, which has done much to assure the people of this community, of the Best Available Dairy Products.

They have a large herd of Jersey Cows which produce the milk for their Patrons. This milk is cooled within 15 minutes after milking and is bottled by the latest and Most Sanitary Process. They do not buy milk but Produe Their Own.

A visit through their plant will not only be a pleasant exploience, but you will see why the IDYLMERE DAIRY PRODUCTS are "ALWAYS GOOD." You will learn here how the most delicate of foods are prepared for your table under the Most Exacting and Inviting Conditions.

This establishment is especially designed to make possible a progressive mechanical and automatic system of handling the product by machinery and under temperature control, thus assuring that at no stage of the journey through this Dairy is the Milk handled by hand, for Modern and Approved Devices are in Operation.

The name of the IDYLMERE DAIRY is a household word with a large percentage of the people of this part of the State who have learned to depend upon this Dairy for Wholesome, Clean Certified Milk, Cream and Other Dairy Products.

The owners of this firm are men of the highest standing in the business circles of this community and take an active part in every movement seeking to promote the welfare of their home town and adjoining territory.

FARM NOTES

One fly killed in early spring means hundreds of flies fewer next summer. Stable manure in which flies may breed rapidly should be hauled to the fields every day if possible, and spread thin so that it will dry. It is best to use a manure spreader. Manure that is not disposed of daily may be treated with hellebore, which will destroy the fly larvae without reducing the fertilizing value of the manure. One-half pound of powdered helebore to 10 gallons of water will treat about 10 cubic feet of manure.

The enormous weed crop raised with the grain every year is one of the reasons why there are not larger yields of grain in the spring-wheat area, says the U. S. Department of Agriculture. This weed crop can be prevented by eliminating the weeds in stubble fields before they form seeds, by destroying the weed seeds in the soil, and by thoroughly cleaning the seed grain.

All poisons in the home such as insecticides, antiseptics, polishes and the like, should be kept secdrely locked up when not in use to prevent accidental poisoning of food, the Food, Drug and Insecticide Administration recommends. Many death are caused every year by accidental poisonings which could be avoided by simple precautions in handling and keeping poisons.

It is sometimes claimed that lightning conductors on farm buildings "draw lightning" and are therefore undesirable, but the U. S. Weather Bureau says that rodded buildings are less likely to be damaged by lightning than unrodded ones. Lightning near a rodded building is usually diverted to the conductors and passes to the ground without harming the building, whereas a stroke on an unrodded building generally causes damage.

The sow needs plenty of good feed while nursing her pigs. Corn or ground barley should be the main feed, supplemented by shorts or middlings, tankage or fish meal, or old-process linseed meal. The corn may be fed on the ear or shelled. Other feeds bay be given dry or in slop. When a change of feed is necessary, it should be made gradually. Simple mineral mixture should be available at all times in a box or self-feeder.

For spraying a few peach trees in the yard or home orchard, a bucket spray pump will do the work. It should be made of brass or some other metal that will not corrode, and have a 4-foot extension rod and at least 15 feet of hose. If the trees are to be dusted, a hand duster consisting of a cylinder with piston rod for making an air blast, can be used although a larger hand duster, in which a fan is operated by cogs or belt from a crank, is more satisfactory and durable.

Sheep, poultry and pigeon manure make excellent fertilizer for the garden. They are very strong, however, and should be used sparingly. Pulverized sheep manure is handled commercially by seedsmen and dealers in garden supplies. Sheep, poultry and pigeon manures lose their value rapidly if exposed to the weather. Lime should not be used as an absorbent in the poultry house as it liberates the nitrogen of the poultry manure.

Poultrymen always used to cool the eggs in an incubator by taking them out for a short time each day. It has been found that this practice is unnecessary, says the U. S. Department of Agriculture, except when the temperature of the incubator has been running too high. To decide whether to cool egrs or not, notice the size of the air cell, which should gradually increase in size. If the development is too rapid, cool the eggs until they feel slightly cool to the touch.

BUTLER TIRE SHOP

SILBERT & JENKINS

EXPERT VULCANIZING

DID YOU BUY NEW TIRES?

There are many ways of keeping down the expense of operating an automobile, and one of them is in watching your tires carefully.

Owners are very apt to use "Quick and Easy" in repairing, namely: "Boots and Tire Dough" when an accident happens and hence they are complaining about the ever increasing tire expense.

In Butler and vicinity, however, "Old Tires Are Made Like New" at THE BUTLER TIRE HOSPITAL, at Butler, Phone 33.

This popular concern has proven that Vulcanized Tires from their establishment will "Save Owners Many a Dollar." Only the most modern and scientifically correct machinery is used and only the most expert work is turned out and satisfaction is therefore guaranteed. It takes experience and proper equipment to Vulcanize Tires Properly and that is why the BUTLER TIRE HOSPITAL excels.

Owners of automobiles and motorcycles will find by patronizing this establishment they can save money and at the same time protect themselves against much tire trouble on the road.

The large trade of the BUTLER TIRE HOSPITAL, proves that many owners have realized this fact and are thus cutting down expenses by visiting this most reliable concern.

This establishment also carries a Large Stock of TIRES and TUBES and are prepared to furnish an automobilist REAL SERVICE.

The BUTLER TIRE HOSPITAL know their business from A to Z and when they give you advice concerning anything in their line you can depend upon what they say.

Have your retail meat man bone a shoulder of lamb for you. Fill the center with hot savory stuffing, sew the edges together to form a plump, square cushion. This piece of meat will be easy to carve, tender, and juicy. It is one of the less expensive cuts of lamb.

Whip half a pint of double cream until stiff, add ½ teaspoon of salt and ½ cup or more powdered sugar and blend well. Fold in carefully 1 quart of selected ripe strawberries that have been washed and capped. Serve at once. If they stand, the juice of the berries will be drawn out and will thin the cream.

* * * *

The oil in "dustless" cloths may be renewed by applying a few drops of kerosene or light lubricating oil in one corner, rolling the cloth, and letting it stand until the oil has spread evenly. Or a little oil may be added to the rinsing water after washing the duster. One tablespoon of kerosene or one half tablespoon of light lubricating oil to one quart of water gives good results.

If the dairyman buys all his feed, hires all his labor, and disposes of his milk at current wholesale prices he will make little if any money. If he buys all his feed and does all his own work he may make dav wages. To make the greatest profit raise most or all the feed and market it through the dairy cow at a price at least equal to what the same feed would cost on the market.

It is easier to sow celery evenly if it is mixed with severa ltimes its bulk of finely sifted white sand, white corn meal, fine hominy grits, or any similar material that will not injure the seeds. Celery seeds are so small that 70,000 o fthem weigh only one ounce, and it is difficult to distribute them thinly enough if sown alone.

Haul Pigs to Pasture

A dirty hog lot is a paradise for roundworms. Little pigs are especially susceptible to these parasites. Prevention of roundworm infestation depends, first, on clean farrowing pens and clean sows. Do not let the sows or pigs out of the farrowing pen until ten days or two weeks after farrowing when they should be hauled (not driven) to a clean pasture containing a suitable forage crop on which there have been no pigs since the ground was sown. Keep other pigs away from this pasture and keep the pigs in it away from dirty hog lots. Leave the pigs on the pasture until they are at least four months old or have attained an average weight of 100 pounds. When possible leave them there until they can be turned into the cornfields or otherwise fattened for market.

COLLINSVILLE, Ill. — Angelo Clementi, facing trial in a liquor case, was lured from his home and killed. Police believe he was slain to prevent his testifying against his co-defendants.

RAISED MILLIONS; COULDN'T

CHICAGO, Ill.—Silus Strawn, banker, who raised seventy-four million dollars for Chicago and Cook County, was not allowed to vote in the recent primary because he had changed his address without making proper reports.

Make Buildings Rat-Proof

The cheapest form of "rat insurance" is rat-proof buildisgs, says the Biological Survey of the U. S. Department of Agriculture. Most buildings that are not already rat-proof can be made so at small cost. The first step in rat-proofing a building with brick, stone, or concrete foundation is to search thoroughly for all places where rats might enter, especially small openings around pipes and small cracks. Such openings should be closed with metal sheeting or with concrete. Basement windows and other large openings may be covered with strong durable screening, such as standard, 8-mesh galvanized hardware cloth. Ventilators and sewer openings should be covered with gratings. Doors likely to be left open at night should be equipped with self-closing devices. Farm buildings without rat-proof foundation walls may be raised 18 inches or more from the ground and kept open on all sides. Clear trash from underneath. Corncribs, granaries, and other storage places for food may be equipped with metal rat guards at the tops of the supporting posts, or may be entirely inclosed with wire mesh.

ASSASSINATED

Mauston, Wis.—Shot from behind District Attorney C. G. Price died without being able to make public a promised statement which "would blow the lid off in Juneau county."

INDIANAPOLIS, Ind. — Failing to negotiate a curve, an automobile plunged 40 feet, caught on steel cables and dangled in midair over Eagle Creek. Two unidentified men were killed.

HICKSVILLE SHIPPER COMPANY

THERE'S A REASON

A farmer spends many hours of hard labor in taking care and raising of his live stock for market. After his hard efforts have been put forth to have his stock ready for market, in the best possible condition, the question then arises, "Where is the Best Market?"

There are many places to sell stock, many individuals and firms that claim to be the best market available, but this is not always the case. Every farmer and stock raiser should investigate the advantages offered him by the stock buyer. Is he sure of getting the highest market price, is he sure that he is receiving a fair and honest treatment. He should also take into consideration the reliability of those he sells his stock to. Have they been in business for years? Have they acquired a reputation for integrity and honest dealings?

Taking all these requirements into consideration we are pleased to bring before our farmer readers the HICKSVILLE SHIPPERS COMPANY, at Hicksville. They have been shipping stock for years in this locality. We have made inquiries among the farmers of this section and we have heard nothing but praise of the fair dealings of This Firm. The courtesy that is always shown to their patrons, information gladly given by them as to the condition of the market and the highest price that the market will stand.

The small stock buyer, everyone knows, is not on the "inside" and therefore consequently is not in a position to give the farmer the best of service. There are no larger shippers of stock in the part of Indiana than THE HICKSVILLE SHIPPERS COMPANY at Hicksville.

There is a reason for this. They know their business, and the market and they are so well known by the farmers and stock raisers of this vicinity, that they have their confidence and consequently they receive their shipments as the farmer knows full well that he can not do better elsewhere and get the service that he receives at the hands of THE HICKSVILLE SHIPPERS CO.

GEORGE B. HART, of Spencerville, is their representative for the territory of Spencerville and St. Joe. Anyone who has stock to sell, or desiring any information in regard to markets or shipping of stock, get in touch with either W. H. BRICKER, at Hicksville, Phone 18, or GEORGE B. HART, at Spencerville, Phone 421.

We are pleased to mention THE HICKSVILLE SHIPPERS CO. in our Farm Edition. Proud to mention that they know their business and all who have business dealings with them will receive courteous, fair and honest treatment. In fact there is no better market for Hogs, Calves, Lambs and Stock than that of THE HICKSVILLE SHIPPERS COMPANY.

HICKSVILLE GARAGE

A GARAGE THAT RENDERS REAL SERVICE

In this community we find some firms that are entitled to extended mention, not only because of the reliability and honesty of their operations, but as well for the efficiency of their service and the up-to-date policy that governs their commercial activity.

This is particularly true of the HICKSVILLE GARAGE, at Hicksville, Phone 396. There is not a more reliable establishment than this Garage at Hicksville which renders "Real Service."

Employing only EXPERT MECHANICS who are thoroughly conversant with every feature of the business, they specialise in Prompt and Efficient Work of the highest order.

No matter what trouble you may be having, they can remedy it for you if science makes this possible, and if it cannot be repaired satisfactorily they will tell you so, thus saving owners much time, trouble and expense.

As regards Accessories and Supplies: The HICKSVILLE GARAGE has a large stock and everything is High Grade. They are prepared to furnish Parts and this is a very important feature of their service.

A feature of this institution is the Electrical Work on Automobiles in all its phases. This is in the hands of men of ability who understand all the scientific parts of the construction and equipment of the modern automobile. No matter what it is in this line you desire, the re-charging of Batteries, Repair Work or Advice on this feature of your machine, you should call at this station and you will get the correct information.

So competent and efficient is their work along these lines that automobile owners have selected this Garage as their "Service Station" in this section.

They also have the agency for Several Different makes of RADIOS. Call and look them over.

It is such firms as this one and such business men that add to the growth and prosperity of the modern American city.

O. W. MILLER PLUMBING SHOP

PLUMBERS OF ABILITY

What the arteries are to the body, a plumbing system is to the home. This comparison is indeed not far-fetched. Both require careful and expert attention when they need repair. If your circulatory system is bad, you are doomed; if the plumbing system of a home is defective, you are never at peace.

THE O. W. MILLER PLUMBING SHOP, 139 High Street, Hicksville, Phone 477, make it their business to put and keep the plumbing system of your house in order.

THE O. W. MILLER PLUMBING SHOP and their employes, have gained that mastery of their trade which only comes with careful study and long experience. If you have plumbing troubles you need look no further to have them eliminated.

If your are building a home consult them. They will gladly advise you as to the very best that can be obtained in the way of a plumbing system for your home. If you wish they will take the contract to entirely install the plumbing system in your home. Their work is guaranteed and their prices the most reasonable possible consistent with the high quality of their services. Their excellent work and their never-failing service together with the high grade materials which they use have earned for them a reputation as sanitary engineers not exceeded in this section of the state.

If you visit THE O. W. MILLER PLUMBING SHOP'S stock rooms, and display rooms, you will see there the BEST that can be bought in the line of plumbing supplies. The fixtures are of the latest design and have the most modern scientific appliances to assure their convenience.

You will also find on display in this house the latest kitchen plumbing supplies. All these conveniences which take away the drudgery from kitchen work. Sinks which contain the latest convenient device to make such tasks as dish washing far less annoying.

You will find here, too, all the fixtures for a modern vapor heating system in the home. Scientists have long agreed that the most healthy kind of heat is that supplied by the vapor system—steam and hot water.

THE O. W. MILLER PLUMBING SHOP are experts. The proper installation of a steam or hot water furnace is the job of no apprentice. It requires the most careful knowledge of the principles of heat and long experience to furnish an acquaintance with the practical details which determine the successful operation of such a system.

Needless to say, the enviable reputation of the O. W. MILLER PLUMBING SHOP at Hicksville, has been achieved only by doing business on the fairest basis possible.

They also carry a complete line of Water Softeners and Electric Water Systems.

People instinctively fear sanitary engineers because of their fees. There is not a home in this or surrounding communities where they have worked that will not vouch for the reasonableness of the charges and the high quality of the work.

BRACY WEST MOTOR SALES

UNUSED MILEAGE AT ATTRACTIVE PRICES

When an automobile comes off the factory production line represents a potential number of miles of transportation. Until this mileage has been obtained the automobile has a value the amount of which is dependent upon the unused mileage. There are many who disdain to buy a used car, but their actions are similar to the men who become angry at a railroad and bought a round trip ticket and then got his revenge by not using his return ticket.

Just an example of the unused transportation which a used car represents.

The wise purchaser today is turning to the used car market, knowing that there he can obtain greater values for his dollars. It is reasonable to suppose—and such is the fact—that the more expensive car is the better. There is more miles of transportation built into it, they have additional mechanical and structural features which contribute to automotive comfort.

The more expensive car driven approximately a year has all of the above mentioned advantages over the cheaper New Car, except that its potential mileage has been reduced. This fact, however, is more than made up by the greater mileage built into the car at the start. Unused transportation in the way of High-Priced Cars can be purchased of the BRACEY WEST MOTOR SALES, 114 E. Main, Butler, Phone 79, for the same price and often times less than the price of the cheaper New Cars. These used cars are carefully checked by mechanics who know their business and if they need any repairs it is done by REAL MECHANICS who have had years of experience on autos.

At this season of the year, when spring buying is starting, there are many exceptional opportunities to purchase REAL Used Cars at BARGAIN PRICES at the BRACY WEST MOTOR SALES at Butler, who are Absolutely Honest and Reliable in their dealings and stand back of every car they sell whether they are High Priced Cars or Low Priced Ones.

CENTRAL GROCERY COMPANY

THE PEOPLE'S FRIEND

It is one thing to buy at a Grocery where everything seems to be in order and the stock is only of a fair quality, and quite a different matter to make your purchase at a First Class Establishment such as the CENTRAL GROCERY COMPANY, 120 E. Hight St., Hicksville. Phone 30, where all things are neat and clean and the lines handled are of the very best.

At the CENTRAL GROCERY COMPANY the clerks are very courteous and exert every energy to see that you receive the highest class of goods and the most accommodating service.

The CENTRAL GROCERY COMPANY decided when they starter in business that the best was none too good for the people of Hicksville and vicinity. They then proceeded on their business career with the determination to see that their customers received the class of goods surpassed by none.

They placed "Quality First" as their "Watch Word." That they have succeeded in their endeavor is evidenced by the popularity of their Grocery and the volume of trade they are receiving.

They have kept this determination in mind from day to day until now they own and operate a store of which they and the people may be proud.

All of their line of Groceries are not only "The Best" but "Fresh" and "Clean," while their Fruits and Vegetables are of the Best Variety, Large, and Luscious.

They do not limit their business to groceries, but they handle a full line of Fresh Cured and Cold Meats. In fact, they are prepared to give you "Real Service."

They are among the leading business men of Hicksville and their establishment adds to the attractiveness of that city as a trading center. They always pay the highest price for farm produce.

HOSACK'S

WELL KNOWN FUNERAL DIRECTORS

To help lessen the pain at the time of death, to see that everything is done that can be done to make the last services of our dead satisfying, to surround the Funeral Rites with a Magnificence that is glorious—this is the work of these dignfied yet up-to-date Funeral Directors, HOSACK'S, 221 E. High St., Hicksville. Phone 219.

From the time they are called in at the time of death, you may rest assured that every detail of the burial service will be taken off your hands. They make a specialty of taking over all arrangements and carrying them through perfectly.

Theirs is a business which only a comparatively few men are prepared to enter.

It is not just a matter of skill or just knowing the techinque of embalming. The successful Funeral Director must have more than just these qualities; he must have the personality, a certain aptness for handling delicate situations and a dignity that is required in but few professions. HOSACK'S measure up to this high standard in every detail.

They seem to possess the inherent ability for their work. In addition to their own skill, they are equipped to conduct a funeral, whether large or small. Complete Motor Equipment which includes a Funeral Coach and several Funeral Cars for carrying a large number of friends.

HOSACK'S are licensed Embalmers. They are recognized throughout this section of the state as being particularly skilled.

If you do not have facilities for having a funeral conducted in your home, and you desire to have a private ceremony, this firm has a beautiful Chapel, completely fitted for carrying out the funeral ceremony with the utmost facility. Persons who have witnessed burial rites here have expressed appreciation for giving to the community such a home, where private burial services can be conducted.

We wish to call your attention to these highly respected and professional men, HOSACK'S, at Hicksville, who have gained a reputation throughout this section as funeral directors of ability.

C. A. DOUGLAS SHOE STORE

BETTER SHOES FOR LESS

The well known C. A. DOUGLAS SHOE STORE, South Broadway, BUTLER, Phone 280, is among the most pregressive in this section of the state and is a store that "Saves Their Patrons Many a Dollar." Barrows Are Most Profitable

Hog feeders will get better gains from feeding barrows than from feeding sows says the U. S. Department of Agriculture in announcing conclusions from a study of the influence of sex of swine on feed-lot returns. Over a period of 8 years the Bureau of Animal Industry analysed the feed-lot records of 5,663 hogs (3,018 barrows and 2,635 sows). The barrows outgained the sows by 5.43 per cent. The tests included hogs fed in practically all parts of the country, under various climatic conditions and during nearly every month of the year. Specialists studied most systems of management, including dry-lot feeding, and pasture supplemented by limited rations. In some of the tests a limited ration of barley was fed, followed by a full feeding of corn; in others this ration was reversed. Alfalfa, mixed clovers, and temporary pastures such as rye, oats, wheat, cowpeas, and soybeans, were used to carry the hogs. Some of the hogs were full fed from weaning to a weight of about 200 pounds; others were started on full feed at weights as high as 150 pounds, and carried along to 500 pounds or more. Practically all known hog feeds, including peanuts and soybeans, were fed. The resulting carcasses graded in firmness all the way from oily to hard.

The farm horse is less likely to get sore shoulders if it gets special care in early spring until the muscles harden and the winter hair sheds. Clean the shoulders carefully after the day's work and before harnessing in the morning. After removing the harness, wash the shoulders with warm water and castile soap, and rinse with cold salt water. Keep this up for two or three weeks. It is worth while to spend a little time on the horse in the field. Raise the collar and clean the sweat, dirt and dead hair from the shoulders and collar. Whenever possible, lift the collar forward and let the horse's shoulders cool off.

Proofing Buildings

Termites, or white ants, are not particular about their diet. They feed on living vegetation, on shoes, papers, and wood—in fact, on anything that contains cellulose. But they can't work without water. To construct buildings so they will be white-ant proof, the U. S. Department of agriculture says to make the foundations of stone, brick, or concrete, if possible, and lay concrete floors on a gravel base. Eliminate structural wood from basements and cellars. If this is impracticable, use timber impregnated with coal-tar creosote. Lay basement window sills and frames over concrete and do not allow woodwork to come in contact with the ground. Complete dryness of foundations and basement walls and flooring is an important means of making buildings safe from attack. Damage to buildings is especially serious in the Southern Central, and Pacific Coast States. Injury to living vegetation, which is sometimes serious in the Southern and Pacific Coast States and the Southwest, can be prevented by clean culture, deep fall plowing, and insecticides.

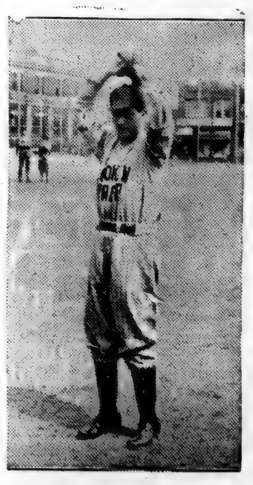
Airplane Agriculture

The airplane is coming to the front as a farm "implement," says the U. S. Department of Agriculture, for dusting cotton and other crops. In 1927 about 500,000 acres of cotton in the United States were dusted by airplane. Most persons think this is not so. Airplane dusting is sold by contract. The operating company provides the plane, pilots, poison, and everything needed, and the farmer merely contracts for the applications he needs, whether his acreage is 10 or 10,000. The service may be used by small farmers co-operatively. The general price of airplane dusting, says the Department of Agriculture, is no greater than the cost of a farmer's making the application himself with ordinary dusting machinery, and prices will undoubtedly be lower as the industry develops. Airplane dusting can only be done on fairly level land, however. Its greatest advantage is that it can be used regardless of conditions of the soil.

There is no "cureall" for all types of worms that infest poultry and other animals. Labels on vermifuges, or "worm expellers," must state the name of the worm or worms for which the preparations are to be used, and the proper dosage (if the dosage is given) for the type, weight, size, and age of the animal for which they are recommended, according to a ruling of the Food, Drug, and Insecticide Administration, U. S. Department of Agriculture.

It's a good plan to whitewash the cow stable once or twice a year. Good whitewash may be made with only lime and water. Ordinary hydrated lime may be mixed with water; or lump lime may be slacked with a minimum amount of water and then more water added to bring the whitewash to a proper consistency. Only freshly burned lump lime should be used, and any that is air slacked should be discarded, as whitewash made from such lime will not stick. If the floor is kept wet while the whitewashing is being one, it will be easier to remove any that may be dropped on the floor.

FOOTLESS PITCHER WINS SCHOOL GAME



NEW YORK CITY — Johnny Dollard, Brooklyn Prep's footless pitcher, hurled his team to its second victory of the season yesterday by turning back the Manual Training nine by a score of 8 to 3. Dollard went the full nine innings, striking out five batsmen and banging out a sharp single which featured his team's rally. He lost his legs under the wheels of a train while returning from school one day, but despite this handicap he has garnered himself a regular berth on the school nine. He uses artificial limbs in order to get around. Photo shows Johnny Dollard.

AUBURN IRON AND METAL CO.

THEY PAY THE HIGHEST PRICE

It has only been in recent years that great industrial firms recognized the value of systematic disposal of waste material. In certain communities a few enterprising men saw that they could develop something of value to themselves to handle the waste material of both large and small industrial plants.

This today is the business of the AUBURN IRON & METAL CO., Third and Van Buren streets, Auburn, Phone 132.

Few people realize the volume of such business. One gasps with surprise when one realizes the number of tons of old iron and scrap shipped out by this firm. And this does not include the great amount of Junk disposed of locally. Thus a profit is brought into the community from the disposal of waste material.

The AUBURN IRON & METAL CO. are also dealers in WOOL, HIDE and FUR and their establishment is valuable to the community in another way. A part of their machine is broken, everyone knows the high price of new parts, but they do not have to spend money in this way. They need but come to the AUBURN IRON & METAL CO., tell them what they want and immediately they go to the carefully stored piles and in the great majority of cases find the part wanted and it is purchased at only a fraction of the cost of a new part.

They make a specialty of buying old autos, machinery, pulleys, shafting, etc., and all kinds of scrap iron of every description and pay the highest price that the market affords. You will find there a complete line of Auto Parts. The business of this concern is not limited to Auburn, but covers the adjoining territory for many miles around.

THE AUBURN IRON & METAL CO. have been in this business for years and have made a success of the business as is evidenced by the size of it.

THE HOFFMAN DRUG STORE

IF IT IS WALL PAPER, PAINT OR DRUGS HOFFMAN HAS IT

We wish to call the attention of our readers to the HOFFMAN DRUG STORE, 101 E. High Street, Hicksville, Phone 32, as they have in stock one of the largest displays of Wall Paper and Paints that includes every shade and color.

There are a number of establishments throughout the country that make it a point to carry a stock in this line that is good to look at but the "Quality Is Not There." We have heard a good many commendations from our readers who have patronized this store at Hicksville in the past and it would be a hard task to try and have them go anywhere else for their home decoration.

In this Large and Well Selected Stock of WALL PAPER you will find any Design and Pattern you may wish. Here is the Cheapest Kitchen Paper to the most expensive Enamels, Holtsmeals and other imported papers and at prices that will stand competition.

In the PAINT DEPARTMENT they carry a complete line of KURFEE'S PAINTS of EVERY COLOR OR SHADE and they are GUARANTEED NOT TO CRACK OR PEEL. The line of OILS, STAINS and VARNISHES are the best that the market affords and here also you will be surprised at the price quoted and the amount that can be saved considering the quality given. When buying PAINT call for KURFEE'S PAINTS, once used, always used.

Here will be found a most complete stock of PAINTERS' and PAPER HANGERS' SUPPLIES.

The manager is thoroughly up-to-date and efficient in regard to colors and shades that go to correspond with decorations of your home and he is never too busy to give you the benefit of years of experience that he has acquired in his vocation.

HOFFMAN carries a most complete line of Drugs and Druggists' Sundries. They also pay particular attention to filling prescriptions.

We are pleased to be able to bring to the attention of our readers this store at Hicksville in this, our Farm Edition, and you will make no mistake in calling at their establishment and selecting your Wall Paper and Paints. Or if in need of Drugs of any kind, you will find it here.

JEFFRIES & CULLER HARDWARE

THE KNISELY BROS. & CO. STATE BANK

THE BANK OF THE PEOPLE

From the time of the organization of THE KNISELY BROS. & CO. STATE BANK, the Directors have been men of high moral character, business experience and civic enterprise. While its officers have been uniformly men of conservative action with never a suggestion of speculative tendency, they have always had the confidence of the public and have pursued in the past, as they will in the future, a policy of helpfulness to the business needs and requirements of the citizens of this community.

THE KNISELY BROS. & CO. STATE BANK are manufacturers whose product is "Credit." Their knowledge of the raw material from which credit is made, knowledge of men and farkets, commerce and finance, drawn from original sources, tested and woven into fabric of mutual confidence—which is "credit."

The resources of this Bank insure a Credit production which is adequate to meet the needs of expanding business. Business of fifty years ago used banks only for two things, deposits and loans, and the banker sat back and waited for the public to come to him.

Today, when finance has become one of the most intricate phases of business, banking has developed a breadth of service that enables it to be of general usefulness to the business man and farmer, as well as the individual. Today the banker does not wait for the people to come to him—the Banker is offering Service and Good Service. No business can stand still. It must either go on upward to greater success or sink to ultimate nothingness. In co-operating with business men in building up their business, this bank brings energy and understanding that comes from long experience and a really progressive policy.

Character is an attribute of banks as well as individuals. Your connection with a financial institution such as this bank, which is highly esteemed in the community, and is known for its proper adherence to business methods gives insurance of lasting co-operation in your affairs.

As with character in your friends, character in a bank makes association that is both pleasant and profitable.

Always progressive and sound in business policy, this bank has created a confidence among the public which brings forth a justified pride to its Officers and Directors and which is prized most highly as one of its assets.

A complete Banking Service, including Commercial, Savings, Investments, Service and Safe Deposit Departments, Insurance and Bonds, together with the friendly co-operation extended has won for this bank hundreds of satisfied customers.

DE KALB TANKING COMPANY

OF THE GREATEST IMPORTANCE

It is of the greatest importance that the most strict legal regulations as regards sanitation be observed. Many communities are placed at a disadvantage in the enforcement of these requirements because they have no industry which is devoted to the conservation of the public health exclusively. In this respect we are fortunate and wish to direct our readers' attention to the DE KALB TANKING CO., 325 South Indiana Ave., Auburn, Phone 180-W.

The DE KALB TANKING CO. renders prompt and efficient service to the public in general by the Removal of Dead Stock. While the death of live stock is an incident to always be regretted, the immediate removal of the carcass is always desirable and should be accomplished at the earliest possible moment.

No matter how far from town you may live, you need only to inform the DE KALB TANKING COMPANY at Auburn and dismiss the matter from your mind, for they have won the commendation of many farmers and stockmen throughout the community by the promptness exercised in responding to the calls, having not only the most modern large auto trucks for the removal of carcasses, but the most dependable.

They serve the public in a double capacity, for these carcasses, which were formerly waste material, are manufactured into high grade tankage which is sold to the public at figures substantially below those asked by many other firms. Thus the hide and every portion of the carcass is conserved.

This plant is one of the most modern in the country and is up-to-date in every particular. They pay all telephone charges and we urge our readers that when in need of the services of an efficient company of this kind they call THE DE KALB TANKING CO. at Auburn and you will find that they will be most prompt in rendering efficient service. Just tell the operator to reverse the charges.

AUBURN DINER

A GOOD PLACE TO EAT

This is what everybody looks for and asks for when they go to a strange town. Even some of the farmers of this vicinity ask this question. Let us give you the answer. Eat at the AUBURN DINER, 110 South Cedar St., Auburn, Phone 671, which is located in a very convenient location for farm and city patrons.

Here you will receive the most and best there is in town for your money.

THE AUBURN DINER is known as one of the Cleanest and most up-to-date Restaurants in the city.

The Management is a firm believer in the old saying that "Cleanliness is next to Godliness." He insists that the same courtesy be extended to all who patronize his Restaurant whether it be a Banker, Farmer, Laborer, or whoever it may be, they will get the same courteous and efficient service. It is due largely to this fact that his business is increasing from day to day. If you eat here once, you will Always Come Back.

Another feature of THE AUBURN DINER is the HOME-LIKE COOKING. Unlike many restaurants and cafes, the food you get here is Well Cooked. Having had many years of experience in the restaurant line, the management knows that a satisfied customer is one of the best means of advertising, and to be able to have Satisfied Customers a person must be thoroughly conversant with his business. There is no one in Auburn who is more thoroughly versed in this line than the management.

THE AUBURN DINER, AT AUBURN, has that WELCOME atmosphere that is lacking in most places. You can go in, sit down and eat your dinner, breakfast or supper with a feeling that you are WELCOME and that your patronage is appreciated.

No matter whether it is a Steak, Toast, or a Special Order that you desire; they have it. Come in and try their home-like cooking once—and you will be a steady customer.

HICKSVILLE PRODUCE COMPANY

COMMERCIAL EFFICIENCY

The HICKSVILLE PRODUCE CO., at Hicksville, Phone 44, is one of the institutions that have materially aided in the development of this section of the state and has especially been instrumental in aiding the progress of diversified farming in the community.

THE HICKSVILLE PRODUCE COMPANY furnishes the farmers with a most advantageous market for their Eggs and Produce, and therefore operates an institution that is of great economical value to the public. Their prices are far more favorable than would be secured by the people if they had to ship elsewhere, for it is a well known fact that this concern Pays the Top of the Market at all times.

One of the recognized principles of farming along scientific lines today is the raising of Poultry. It is because of the excellent service and the desirable market afforded by such houses as are operated by this well known company that this feature is receiving more attention from farmers today and progress along this line is particularly noticeable in the community where the producer knows that he will receive the highest prices for his Poultry, Eggs, and other Produce.

Another feature of the very satisfactory service of THE HICKSVILLE PRODUCE COMPANY, at Hicksville, is the courtesy and accommodation which marks their dealings with the producer. This establishment is under the direction of a competent business man and he has associated with him only such assistants as he can depend upon to render the most courteous service.

They are always willing and ready to give you the latest market quotations and those wishing to market their produce should get in touch with them.

We are pleased to compliment THE HICKSVILLE PRODUCE CO., at HICKSVILLE on the position they hold and that their reliable policies have merited. We assure our readers that here they will receive the best of treatment and the highest market prices at all times from this firm.

DAILEY'S GARAGE

A REAL REPAIR SHOP

Every locality has among its people, men who thoroughly understand their business and Auburn and vicinity is fortunate in having in its midst a man "Who Knows the Auto Game." We refer to the DAILEY GARAGE, East Fifth Street, Auburn, Phone 161-M.

THE DAILEY GARAGE has become very popular with the automobile owner, as the fact has become known for miles around that he has mechanics of ability. No job whether overhauling an automobile or a tractor is too tough for them to handle and when they have finished their work, the owner of the machine is satisfied both with the quality of work done and the price charged. He has always been honest and fair with his customers.

While he is an expert on automobiles, he is also an expert on the repairing of batteries and ignition. It makes no difference what the make of your battery, he knows the mechanical part of every known battery, and when he has finished with it, it will produce the "pep."

THE AUBURN AUTO TOP COMPANY'S reputation as "Designers of Tops" is well merited, as they have been able to "Make Old Autos and Vehicles Present an Excellent Appearance."

In this Farm Edition we wish to compliment the management upon the position that the AUBURN AUTO TOP COMPANY, at Auburn, occupies in the industrial world of this section and to assure the public that at this establishment you will always get "High Class Goods and the Best of Workmanship."

Studies in breeding foxes at the Experimental Fur Farm of the Biological Survey of the United States Department of Agriculture at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., show that the characters of a "samson" fox—one that lacks guard hairs and thus produces a nearly worthless pelt—are probably inherited, making such animals worthless for breeding.

The cowpea succeeds under such a wide range of conditions that it can be used to good advantage in alsis especially valuable as a catch crop and for hay or seed production.

To grow quickly, chicks need high protein feeds the first few weeks. Chicks will grow rapidly if fed for the first 3 or 4 weeks, feeds that contain 20 per cent good-quality protein, and for the next 5 or 6 weeks, feeds that are from 16 to 20 per cent protein.

Feeding tests show that soybeans are desirable in poultry rations as a source of protein. However, the soybean ration should be supplemented with a good mineral mixture Many farmers have found that poultry eat the whole beans more readily if soaked or cooked.

Crop rotation is both a preventive and a control measure for plant diseases that are caused by nemas, or nematodes. If a nemic disease contaminates a soil, through infested seeds, nursery stock, implements, or the like, crop rotation will prevent or at any rate hinder its establishment. If the pest is already established, crop rotation is one of the best means by which soil can be cleaned. It is absolutely necessary to keep out the weeds if good results are to be expected through crop rotation.

Many dairy cows are undersized and low producing because they did not get enough of the right kind of feed when they were young and growing. After a heifer has freshened and is producin milk it is difficul tfor her to make up for growth lost through poor feeding when young.

For dairy cows, hominy feed is comparable with corn meal in nearly all respects and is thought to be equal in feeding value pound for pound. It is not so likely to heat and mold as is the corn meal.

Keep young chicks away from turkeys and from areas occupied by turkeys if you want to avoid losses by gapes. Turkeys commonly harbor gapeworms even though they show no sign of gapes. Adult chickens are practically immune and do not carry the parasites. Chicks are highly susceptible. The worms are deadly to chicks.

Purebred hogs raised for breeding purposes should be handled somewhat differently than hogs raised for fattening for market. Breeding hogs should be fed with the idea in mind of growing a good frame that will support the body for several years rather than one whose usefulness ends at the age of 8 or 9 months. To accomplish this, breeding hogs should be given a higher percentage of protein and mineral feeds and should have the run of a good pasture whenever available. Corn should make up about one-fourth of the ration, the balance consisting of shorts or middlings, a little fish meal or tankage, and pasture. Skim milk or buttermilk is good if it is available. Oats may be fed in a self-feeder or scattered thinly on a feeding floor, but should never be fed by pouring in piles or in a trough. Light-weight oats should never be fed, as they are too bulky.

The Sorghum Midge

The destructive sorghum midge is one pest that can not be controlled by an insecticide, since all of its stages, with the exception of the adult, are passed within the seed husks of the plant. However, losses of sorghum grains due to midge which come into the field from outside sources can be considerably reduced by the following recommendations of the Bureau of Entomology of the U. S. Department of Agriculture. Locate the field as far as possible from outside sources of infestation, such as Johnson grass, old sorghum fields, broomcorn, and Sudan grass, and so that the prevailing wind blows away from it toward the most probable source of infestation. Destroy any near-by heads, such as those of volunteer sorghum or wild-grass host plants before the appearance of the sorghum heads. Plant the field at such a date that it will bloom before or at about the same time as the fields from which infestation is expected, or after emergence of midges has ceased in them.

Grows on Sour Land

It is possible to grow good legume hay and good pasture on land that is too "sour" for red clover by planting alsike clover, usually in mixtures with timothy or other grasses. Alsike clover will endure overflow that would kill most crops, and has been known to grow a year in water-soaked and water-covered soil and make a heavy growth. Mixed with red clover on uplands, alsike clover insures a stand on spots where red clover will not catch.

MAXTON CHEVROLET SALES

A SIX AT THE PRICE OF A FOUR

Performance heretofore unexcelled in a car at its price is promised in the new valve-in-head six-cylinder "Chevrolet" that is sold and distributed in this section by the MAXTON CHEVROLET SALES, at Butler, and FURNISH MOTOR SALES, at Spencerville.

The motor has a three and five-sixteenth bore and a three and three-quarter inch stroke. It has a high compression, non-detonating head and is fully enclosed. The piston displacement is 194 cubic inches. This new six develops 32 per cent more power than its famous predecessor; its acceleration is measurably greater and its speed has been stepped up to satisfy maximum requirements.

Despite this greatly improved performance, exacting tests have shown that this new car will run with an average economy of better than twenty miles to the gallon of gasoline, which is practically the same fuel economy enjoyed by the owners of the previous four-cylinder model.

The new transmission gears are made of the finest vanadium steel affording even greater ease of handling under all driving conditions.

Throughout the entire chassis is found similarly advance design. Four long semi-eliptic shock absorber springs set parallel to the frame and equipped with Alemite lubrication at all the shackle joints which cushions the entire upper structure against road shocks. A full ball-bearing steering mechanism with complete lubrication at all points of contact, results in delightful ease of control. Newly designed four-wheel brakes, positive in action, easy of application and noiseless in operation.

The marvelous new bodies by Fisher are longer, lower and roomier and incorporate in all closed models an adjustable driver's seat that may be moved forward and back to suit the comfort of the driver.

Go to the salesrooms of the MAXTON CHEVROLET SALES, at Butler, and FURNISH MOTOR SALES, at Spencerville, and have them give you a full description of the "Greatest of all Chevrolets," the car that is the final proved product of more than four years research and experimentation in the "Chevrolet" experimental laboratories, the General Motors research laboratories and the General Motors proving ground.

BUTLER CHICK HATCHERY

BABY CHICKS FOR THIS SEASON

Baby Chicks for this season that are "Real Baby Chicks," is offered the Farmer and Raiser of Poultry by the BUTLER CHICK HATCHERY, at Butler, Phone 223, Messrs. BRIEGEL & SCHIMPS, Managers.

The farmer and chicken raiser runs no risk of hatching chicks. He can buy his young chicks from this Hatchery, can see what he buys and thereby can select Strong, Healthy Chicks. In fact these are the only chicks that are hatched at the BUTLER CHICK HATCHERY.

The eggs that are used for hatching these chicks are selected from the best known breeds of hens and selected cockerels. This insures strong and healthy chicks, with strength and vigor which comes from pure blood and scientific mating. These chicks will develop rapidly into prolific and perfectly shaped fowls.

Another feature of buying chicks from the BUTLER CHICK HATCHERY is the saving of time and trouble of setting hens and continually fighting lice, mites and other infections common to hen hatched chicks.

After you have your chicks hatched and ready to raise every precaution should be exercised to help nature produce flesh and strength. It is essential that the best food should be given them that they may have all the advantages toward rapid growth and maturity.

THE BUTLER CHICK HATCHERY, at Butler, is equipped with the very best of Incubators and Brooders and great care is taken with the chicks to see that they are in the best of condition before being sent out. People who have bought here have had excellent success and they can refer anyone who doubts to numerous successful chicken raisers.

The success of THE BUTLER CHICK HATCHERY has been marked and is the result of their healthy chicks sold and the fact that they have always asked fair prices and given the best of service.

Call at this Hatchery and have a talk with the management. You will obtain some valuable information as to the raising of chicks from them as they have had years of experience in the raising of poultry and will be pleased to confer with you.

MAXWELL BROTHERS

FOR DAD AND LAD

There is nothing so important to the Farmers and Residents of the smaller cities as an up-to-date establishment at close range where "Dad and Lad" are able to secure the metropolitan styles and service in Haberdashery and Clothing.

This is the day and age when men both young and old must be neat attired in clothes of Distinction and Quality. In Hicksville and vicinity the desires and demands of the male population are more than satisfied at the store of MAXWELL BROTHERS. This establishment is strictly up-to-date stocked with a class of goods that would do credit to a much larger city than Hicksville.

They feature LORD ROCHESTER STYLING and CURLEE CLOTHES FOR MEN AND YOUNG MEN.

These clothes are widely known for their snap and style, as well as the high quality and wide range of patterns for both conservative and ultra-fashionable customers.

You will find that their other departments are on a par with their clothing, for the MAXWELL BROTHERS are representative for widely known and highly popular lines of Men's Wear, which are known as the most superior grade of Men's Furnishings.

This store is well stocked with Collars and Underwear of Highly popular brands, Shirts of the latest patterns, Ties that are approved by the arbiters of fashion for the present and approaching season. Hosiery of the latest styles; hats and caps of the latest styles and shapes; in fact, every need of the well-dressed man will be found here at most reasonable prices.

MAXWELL BROTHERS up-to-date Boys' Department is their pride, and well they may be proud of this department, as it is one of the most modern and up-to-date Boys' Departments in this section of Indiana, where everything can be found for the youngster.

THE MAXWELL BROTHERS, at Hicksville, are men of ability, successful in their chosen field of mercantile endeavor by reason of their wide experience and comprehensive knowledge of Men's Clothing and Men's Wear.

SEELY BAKING COMPANY

A WHOLESOME STRENGTH BUILDING FOOD

The staff of life is bread and we should be very careful and particular what kind of bread we eat. That it is made in a clean and sanitary bakery, by bakers who are particular as to personal cleanliness and who use only Pure and Wholesome Ingredients.

That is why BANNER BREAD manufactured by the SEELY BAKING CO., East High Street, Hicksville, Phone 144, is found upon so many tables in this section.

The housewife has discovered that this bread meets all the requirements of a "good bread" and that is why she insists upon her dealer keeping Banner Bread.

No other bread meets with such universal satisfaction as this, and that is why the SEELY BAKERY is kept so busy at their bakery at Hicksville.

The baking industry is practically as old as the discovery of fire and the methods used in ancient times have changed from baking on stones and in rudely constructed ovens, as like other great industries, it had a humble beginning. Today it is quite different at the Modern and up-to-date Bakery Establishment of the SEELY BAKERY where the latest style of oven and machinery are in operation for the production of Banner Bread.

Another feature of this establishment is the Cleanliness which is insisted upon throughout the entire plant. Everything is kept scrupulously clean and in a strictly sanitary condition. Only the very best of material is used and the most competent help is employed.

The Baking establishment of the SEELY BAKING CO is among the most modern and up-to-date within this section, the Banner Bread having gained a reputation far and wide as the "Bread That Is Often Buttered—But Never Bettered."

DICKENSON & SONS TRUCKING CO.

JUST AROUND THE CORNER—OR 100 MILES

There is nothing so aggravating as delay when you are in a hurry and the prime aggravation in this respect is the inexcusable delay of the dray or transfer man.

To avoid trouble of this kind the people of Auburn and vicinity turn over this feature of their patronage to DICKENSON & SONS TRUCKING CO., 108 West Ninth Street, Auburn, Phone 66.

Realizing that one of the essentials of their trade is "promptness" this popular firm maintains sufficient equipment to enable it to fill all orders with rapidity and dispatch. It does not matter whether you wish them to haul for you a small box just around the corner, or to move all your furniture one hundred miles, you can depend upon it, that they will be on the job at the time they promise.

In addition to this they have won for themselves a reputation for careful handling of all goods entrusted to their care and thus their trade has been increasing. If you are contemplating moving, or expect to be in need of a transfer man, better let them know in advance.

A special feature of their service is their long distance hauling, being equipped with large, modern trucks of large capacity for moving household goods, merchandise and pianos from city to city.

They pack and ship household goods. If shipped by railroad; call them up and they will give you free of charge, an estimate on packing and shipping goods.

We are pleased to compliment the management of this concern upon their modern equipment and satisfactory service and to assure our readers that whatever they demand in the way of latter day transfer service, whether it is JUST AROUND THE CORNER OR ONE HUNDRED MILES—Let the DICKENSON & SONS TRUCKING CO. at Auburn do it.

A Simple Roach Trap

An effective trap for roaches is made by greasing the sides of deep bread tins with a little rancid butter. The roaches are attracted by the food odor, and are unable to climb out because of the greased sides. Dusting thoroughly with sodium flouride on shelves and in cracks about the kitchen will also exterminate roaches effectively. Sodium flouride is poisonous to people as well as to roaches. Keep it away from children and pets.

The most profitable pig is the one that never stops growing till it goes to market. Pigs are less likely to be fed irregularly and to lose weight if they and the sows are fed in self-feeders where several days' or even a week's sspply of feed may be stored. At the U. S. Department of Agriculture experiment farm in Maryland sows and pigs on self-feeders have proved more thrifty than those that were hand-fed. In tests comparing the two methods of feeding, No. 2 yellow corn, commercial gray middlings of good quality, and 60 per cent tankage were the chief feeds. The pigs ate when they pleased, and as much as they pleased. The outstanding results of the tests were that in the self-fed lots the feed cost per 100 pounds of grain was materially less than the sows and pigs were in better condition at weaning time.

Eighty-one thousand three hundred ninety-six men applied for enlistment in the U. S. Navy last year.

DANCE HALL DEATH

RACINE, Wis. — Rafael Borgi was killed in a quarrel in a dance hall by Amedo Innosena(who claims self defense.

For washing and rinsing utensils a clean, safe water supply is absolutely necessary. Contaminated water may be a source of danger not only to persons living on the farm but also to those who use milk from the farm. Wells and springs should always be protected from surface drainage. The drainage from privies, hog pens, barnyards, and other sources of contamination should always be away from the well, and both springs and wells should be walled in, curbed, and tightly covered.

Corned meat kept over into the next summer should be watched closely in the spring as the brine is likely to spoil. If the brine appears to be "ropy," remove the pieces of meat and scrub them thoroughly with a stiff brush and hot water. Then repack and cover with new brine. The brine should be kept in a cool place, as the sugar in it has a tendency to ferment.

Allow mud stains to dry and brush carefully before any other treatment. Sometimes nothing else is needed. Or, if the fabric is washable, use soap and water. On the other fabrics, try sponging with wood alcohol, denatured alcohol, or plain water. Mud stains may be taken off black silks of firm weave by rubbing with a cut raw potato. The thin film of starch left by the potato can be brushed off when dry. This treatment is not recommended for any other materials. It leaves a spot on any except black fabrics.

BRANDON LUMBER COMPANY

COURTESY, SERVICE AND BUILDING MATERIAL

One of the most important industries in the United States today is the Lumber and Building Materials Line, in as much as there is a concerted honest effort being made by tenants to own their own home, farmers to erect and construct suitable housing institutions and to improve the housing conditions generally.

This naturally means a great work for the firms engaged in Lumber and Building Material Selling. Their work is an important one in ever sense of the word and in DeKalb county it has become one of the leading problems.

THE BRANDON LUMBER CO., 414 W. 5th St., Auburn, Phone 150, are dealers in High Grade Lumber and Building Material, and they are devoting more than ordinary attention to work of this kind and they are prepared to co-operate in many respects, not only in providing ample supplies of "Lumber and Building Material" but in affording builders suitable plans, specifications, bills of estimate and other information that saves time and money for them.

The BRANDON LUMBER CO. handles large quantities of all kinds of Lumber, Builders' Hardware, Interior Finish, Shingles, Wall Board, and everything in the building line.

Their Mill Work department is devoted to producing economically "Mill Work of all Kinds," Doors, Sash, Stairways, Indoor and Outdoor Material for large and Small Structures. They are always ready and eager to assist prospective builders by demonstrating economical modes of building and this, in a day when Building Materials are high in price is most important and economical.

THE BRANDON LUMBER COMPANY delivers whatever is ordered promptly. Their estimates are conservative and based upon honest goods and in every respect they form a most important working organization in the civic and social advancement and attainment of Auburn and surrounding counties.

We are pleased to mention the large Lumber and Building Material Establishment of THE BRANDON LUMBER COMPANY in this Farm Edition, and being acquainted with the proprietors and knowing them to be men of their word, we can recommend them and their establishment to our readers.

GEORGE GEDDES DRUG STORE

A NECESSITY IN EVERY COMMUNITY

In every progressive community the first class Drug Store is a necessity, as well as a convenience for from it comes the drugs and medicines so essential to the practice of the physicians and the articles conducive to the health and comfort of the community.

In Butler, THE GEORGE GEDDES DRUG STORE, Phone Black 31, has gained a well merited reputation for having ably represented this branch of commercial enterprise.

This Drug Store is well appointed and is a model of neatness and attractiveness, nicely furnished and equipped with the latest in show cases and all other fixtures for the proper display of goods.

When we visit a Drug Store we like to know that we will find a pharmacist in charge, who is both efficient and conscientious. Mr. George Geddes has had years of experience in this line and is very careful and conscientious in filling prescriptions and is acknowledged as a leader in his line.

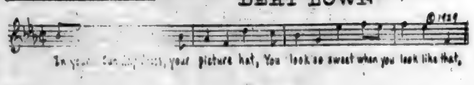
In keeping with their progressive yet reliable policy, they also carry a complete line of chemicals, rubber goods, brushes, soaps, combs, perfumes, toilet articles and in fact everything that one would expect to find in a complete and up-to-date Drug Store.

The great success of this store is due to the service rendered its patrons by the management and their assistants and the most courteous treatment that is extended to all no matter how small the amount of the purchase may be.

The News directs your attention to this store at Butler as one of the distinctive features of the commercial efficiency of the community, and to its able proprietor as among our valued citizens.

Neptune Vies with Broadway for Musical Talent

BERT LOWN



In your Summer outfit, your picture hat, You look so sweet when you look like that,

Ocean Going Liners to Rival Night Clubs With Entertainment

New York City.—Making both Broadway and Main Street at home on the ocean is the job just taken on by Bert Lown, who is also musical director of the Hotel Biltmore here. Lown is to be musical director of a number of steamship lines and will put the same type of men on the ocean that he has at the Biltmore, with the idea of having the passengers step out at tea and in the evening just as at home.

"Gradually the dance orchestras have come into prominence on shipboard, and now most of the ships are out to get the best talent available," he explains.

"Previously, many ships carried native orchestras of the country of origin, and sad attempts were made to play American dance rhythms. For no matter in what waters transoceanic boats are, demands are always for American tunes. That is why it is becoming as customary to have an American orchestra on a ship as it is to have a French chef.

"Many boys from the interior who have dreamed of the sea all their lives now have a chance to realize these dreams with well-paid jobs.

"Musical programs at sea differ very little from those on land. The numbers which are in demand on land get the first call on the ocean. 'The Talk Of The Town', the new foxtrot song, is also the talk of the sea just now, and the many different boats on which I have orchestras all tell the same story."

"ADVERTISEMENTS—EVERY ARTICLE IN THIS SECTION IS A PAID ADVERTISEMENT."

THE BOON BEVINGTON COMPANY

LOW PRICES FOR THE BEST GOODS

Quantity purchases mean lower prices. That is the secret of the BOON-BEVINGTON CO., at Hicksville, Phone 50.

The management knows where to purchase the best goods manufactured for the lowest prices. Being a large buyer they can command a much better price than the merchant who buys in small quantities.

The function of the BOON-BEVINGTON CO., at Hicksville, is to supply every need of the buying public. There are three phases to this service, and all three are found in the superlative degree in this store. The first and primary interest to the buyer is quality and price. Realizing this the management of this store brings to bear its great purchasing powers in stocking the store with the best goods and the latest styles at the lowest possible price. Those in charge realize that their customers must be satisfied, that if they are not they will withdraw their patronage and advise their friends to do likewise. And, conversely, they realize that a satisfied customer is an asset, not only in volume of business by their own purchase, but by advertising their satisfaction among their friends by word of mouth.

The second necessity is courtesy. It is a hard and fast rule among the employes of this store that the person who buys a ten or fifteen cent article must be given the same courteous consideration as the person whose purchase runs into three figures.

The third requirement is Service—with a capital S. In a great measure the success of this store is due to the fact that it has in stock every need of the man, woman and child. It has experienced managers at the head of every department, managers who know what the public wants and whose duty it is to see that that want is satisfied, whether it be large or small, costly or cheap. They must see to it that the latest style is in stock, that every design is tasteful, that the quality is unexcelled and that the price is the best offered anywhere.

The BOON-BEVINGTON CO., at Hicksville, has fulfilled these three obligations to the public. And as a result it is a mecca for the shoppers who know that here they will find what they want at the right price. They can feel safe in taking the advice of the experienced department managers, or in accepting a suggestion from the clerks.

And so buying power, combined with courtesy and service has made the BOON-BEVINGTON CO., at Hicksville, the success that it is, the central unit in the mercantile system of this community.

Dr. C. R. BAUMGARTNER & Dr. HINER

YEARS OF EXPERIENCE AND RELIABILITY

There can be no question in this age of the high prices of hogs and other live stock that the Farmers and Stockraisers should use every effort to save them as the price of even a few means much to him in the way of many dollars lost should they die before marketing.

Science has made Great Advances in the proper care and prevention of Cholera among Hogs and other Diseases among stock; and foremost among the professional men in the community who has given the matter close study is DR. C. R. BAUMGARTNER at Spencerville and DR. HINER at Butler, who represent the best there is in the professional life of the community.

Farmers of known reputation all over the country are testifying to the wonderful results produced by DR. BAUMGARTNER and DR. HINER'S efficient and conscientious service and are rejoicing over the fact that they have taken advantage of the wonderful advances in science along this line.

The methods that these well known VETERINARIANS at Butler and Spencerville use are the result of the researches of the greatest authorities in this line and the wonderful results they are producing is the wonder and admiration of all.

In this Annual Farm Edition we are pleased to give commendable mention to DR. C. R. BAUMGARTNER at Spencerville and DR. HINER at Butler, and their activities in behalf of raising the Standard of live stock in the country and commend his work to those of our readers who have not heretofore investigated the matter.

CITY NATIONAL BANK

A BULWARK OF PROTECTION

The strength of any community rests to a very great extent on the strength of its banks, fiduciary institutions, great monetary reservoirs from which come the currents which set in motion the wheels of productive energy and stimulate the sinews of trade and commerce. In Auburn and vicinity, all classes of People are well cared for by the CITY NATIONAL BANK, one of the soundest and safest financial institutions in the state and one that has stood as a mighty "bulwark of protection" to the interests of the community for years.

The institution's building from a banking standpoint is complete in every particular and the officials of the bank have used every effort to make it practical and convenient, as well as artistic. The bank has had a wonderful growth during recent years.

A general business is done along safe and improved lines, accounts are opened for corporations and individuals, drafts and letters of credit in any part of the world are sold at lowest rates, commercial paper discounted and collections made for home and out of town clients. A Large Savings Department is a feature; here also are Deposit Boxes for rent in the most modern equipped vaults. Through this bank's membership in the FEDERAL RESERVE BANKING SYSTEM and under government protection it is placed in the strongest position to take care of the requirements of all its depositors, whether large or small, whether they keep checking or savings accounts at the same time give them the most modern banking service.

They specialize in the highest type of Road and Municipal Bonds, as a Safe Investment, which are tax exempt and yield 4½ per cent and up. First Mortgage bonds to yield 6½ per cent.

The modern business man before coming to a decision of an important proposition should consult his banker.

The proper handling of your affairs after you are gone is a very important proposition.

The judgment which was at your disposal during your life time is available to your heirs when this bank is named as Executor under your will. Their Trust Department invites your inquiries regarding any matter of Trust.

In this DeKalb County Farm Edition we wish to call our readers' attention to this strong and reliable financial institution, THE CITY NATIONAL BANK at AUBURN.

ALLEN WRIGHT CIGAR FACTORY

HOME OF "HELLO WORLD" CIGARS

The ALLEN WRIGHT CIGAR FACTORY, East Smith Street, Hicksville, Phone 47, is the HOME of the FAMOUS "HELLO WORLD"' CIGARS.

While HELLO WORLD Cigars are not as well known in this community as some other brands that are nationally advertised, they are equally as good, and when you want to enjoy a "Real Smoke" just step into some store and buy a "HELLO WORLD" Cigar and after you have given them a trial you will agree with us that they are among the best smokes on the market today.

"HELLO WORLD" Cigars are very moderate in price. The 2 for 5c cigars are equal to any 5c short filled cigar on the market.

MR. WRIGHT believes in QUALITY and not in QUANTITY and he has carried this policy throughout his years in the manufacturing of Cigars and has put into them only the very best of tobacco which insures you of a "Real Smoke."

Too much cannot be said in regards to the Quality of HELLO WORLD CIGARS and to the factory in which they are made. We wish to compliment MR. WRIGHT upon this modern factory and upon the High Quality of his HELLO WORLD Cigars and to say that when you want a "Real Smoke" try one of these Cigars which are made in HICKSVILLE.

FARM GOSSIP

Experience Is Expensive

We believe it was Shakespeare who said, "Experience is a jewel for it is often purchased at an infinite rate."

Shakespeare knew what he was talking about because we know from experience that experience is expensive.

There are many farmers who think they can farm only from their personal experience and fail to take advantage of the experience of others and save himself much expensive personal experience.

Let them make the costly mistakes and tell you about them and you will be a better farmer.

Paint Your Buildings

"Many people maintain that spring and fall are the only times of the year suitable for painting. We would say that any time is good provided the air is dry and the sun is shining. If the summer sun brings out all the imperfections in the old paint, get right to work and remedy the matter by repainting. During the summer the painters are not so rushed with work, therefore, they have more time to give to the many details necessary to give the best results than they have during rush season. If you want good workmanship and a job that will last; if you would cut down the painting bill and reduce the cost of repairs to the house by prompt attention, not only to the painting but to the thousand and one little repairs necessary to keep any home going, the summer is a good time to paint. Begin preparations at once so when the strenuous fall season comes along, you will be able to meet it with an easy conscience, secure in the knowledge that you are ahead of the game so far as the house is concerned and can give your entire time to farm problems always awaiting your atention," says Southern Planter.

ED W. HICKS

A RELIABLE JEWELRY STORE

There is nothing the average person buys, that they have to depend entirely on the firm selling it to give them what they want, as jewelry. To this fact is due the wonderful success of The HICKS JEWELRY STORE, South Main Street, Auburn, Phone 51.

This is one of the progressive establishments of this section that has long been known as one of the most efficient and reliable stores. Of course, everyone knows that this store is headquarters for Diamonds, Watches, Silverware, Cut Glass and Everything that pertains to a modern and complete stock of Jewelry.

One feature is the Repair department, wherein the experience and expertness of the workman accrues to the advantage of the many patrons of the store.

While HICK'S JEWELRY STORE, at Auburn, is one that in point of stock, quality and workmanship and attractiveness of appointment would compare favorably with the largest establishments of the metropolitan centers, the prices are most favorable; in fact, the matter of price has always been a hobby with the management of this store.

It has ever been their object to secure a fair and honest profit but never an exhorbitant one. Taking all in all, this store is one of the modern and up-to-date establishments of this section that has always been known as one of the most reliable Jewelry stores in this section of the state.

The success of this establishment is a distinct tribute to the business ability of the manager, MR. ED W. HICKS, who always insists that his Jewelry Store serve its patrons with the very best of High Grade Jewelry.

ASHLEY MILLINERY

AUBURN'S LEADING MILLINERY STORE

How do you judge a woman's taste? After all, everything else may be right, but if her hat is unsatisfactory, displeasing to the eyes, she must be branded as a woman of poor taste. Every man knows how important a factor of woman's apparel her hat is. He judges her by it. The women of this community are to be complimented on this fine millinery store conveniently located in their own community where they may satisfy their most discriminating tastes for fine hats.

Few people realize the real art that is required to successfully operate a millinery store. Men are said to be not half as discriminating as women, and if a woman is particular about any one article of apparel more than another, it is about her hat. To buy each season a stock of hats which meets the demand of every shade or taste among the women of a community is no small task.

The ASHLEY MILLINERY STORE, North Main Street, Auburn, was determined to do nothing less than this when this shop opened for business. That The ASHLEY MILLINERY STORE has succeeded, the women of this community will testify.

So many millinery stores have the appearance of being just half-hearted businesses. Anyone visiting this store will know immediately that it is a real live working institution. It is really metropolitan in its equipment and service. Here will be found, in addition to a most complete stock attractively displayed, every facility for the selection fitting and buying of a hat.

You may be assured of the utmost courtesy on the part of the proprietor and sales force. No attempt will be made to urge you to buy a hat. That is contrary to the policy of this store. The owner believes that a single dissatisfied customer is a bad advertisement for the store. She is determined that every woman will get just what she wants.

The service she gives has carried her reputation beyond the limits of this community. Discriminating women from other cities take advantage of the metropolitan service of this store.

This milliner is also an artist in women's apparel. For this reason she is able to offer many helpful suggestions as to what kind of a hat is best suited to a particular individuality or to a

The proprietor, Mrs. ASHLEY, has earned for herself a high place in the business circles and is recognized as a valued citizen in the community.

HARKEY CANNING COMPANY

THEY RENDER A VALUABLE SERVICE

Our Annual Farm Edition would not be complete from a business, agricultural, and industrial standpoint without mention of the HARKEY CANNING CO., 624 N. Main St., Hicksville, Phone 251-02, who are of valuable service to the people of this section, as they are bringing many dollars into the community, not alone to the farmers who sell their product to the HARKEY CANNING COMPANY, but also to the number of people they employ.

Any farmer who wants the ready cash for his Beans, Corn and Tomatoes, and have no expense of shipping, should contract with the HARKEY CANNING CO., at Hicksville, each year for the acreage of these products. In addition to being a paying crop and one that can be cultivated along with the corn crop, Beans and Tomatoes are also harvested when the farmer has no other crop coming off.

Raising of Tomatoes is also another benefit to the farmer aside from the immediate financial returns. Tomatoes as a rotation crop is a great aid to the farmers in building up and increasing the fertility of the soil. Tomatoes as a crop are also another benefit to the farmers. Many universities through scientific tests have proven that the raising of Tomatoes is a great aid in the destruction of chinch bugs which are so destructive in the wheat crop.

So, Mr. Farmer, the HARKEY CANNING COMPANY, at Hicksville, is of value to you in more ways than one. They furnish you a ready market where you can get cash on delivery for your products, and while raising the products you are building up the soil for your next crop and also destroying some of the pests which have cost the farmers many dollars.

The people of this section owe a debt of gratitude to this up-to-date concern which can best be paid by keeping them supplied with corn, beans and tomatoes sufficient to operate at full capacity. The HARKEY CANNING CO., at Hicksville, buys only the best that are produced, which are prepared in a most sanitary manner for the trade. Every thing around their plant is clean and sanitary as it is possible to keep it. Their brands have won a place among the buying public and are known as "The Best There Are."

We are pleased to call our readers' attention to the HARKEY CANNING CO. and the valuable service they are rendering the people of this section.

OBITUARY

William Baker, son of James and Barbara Baker, was born on a farm 2 miles north-west of Spencerville, DeKalb County, Indiana. He was the fourth child of a family of nine children, consisting of six sons and three daughters.

With his parents he moved from his birth place north-west of Spencerville to the Baker farm, east of Concord in the year of 1869. At the age of 24, while employed with the railroad company he met with an accident which caused the loss of part of his limb. From this time his brother, Henry Baker, did the duties of a brother faithfully until his death, when upon he requested that his son, Walter continue.

William Baker passed away June the 8th at the age of 80 years. Surviving are his two brothers Joseph and John of Auburn.

The funeral service was held on Tuesday afternoon from the Kinsey Funeral Home, with Rev. H. J. Studabaker of Spencerville officiating. Burial was made in Riverside cemetery.

Brunson

Sterlin Nathan, son of Aden and Alice Virginia Brunson was born June 3, 1891 in St. Joe, Indiana.

On April 1, 1911, he was united in marriage to Miss Erma Houser, of Butler, Indiana. To this union were born three children, Robert Arlen, aged 16, Ethel Bonnell 13, and Argyl Franklin 4.

In the winter of 1911 he was converted and united with the Fairview Methodist Protestant Church, located near St. Joe. Later they transfererd their membership to the Butler, Indiana U. B. Church. Upon moving to Waterville, Ohio, they again transferred to the Methodist Episcopal Church and continued true and loyal until his call home which occurred about 8 o'clock June 4, 1930. He always became a part of the life of the community in which he lived.

Mr. Brunson was a christian gentleman, honorable and fair in his dealings with his fellowmen. He was of a kind and jovial disposition, had a smile for all, and was on friendly relations with everyone. He supported the church both by his attendance and financial aid, and was interested in everything that makes for the betterment of the community.

He loved his home and bent all his energy toward making that home comfortable and happy. He was a faithful husband, a loving father and a worthy neighbor.

His sudden going is a great shock to the Waterville community as well as his former communities and St. Joe and Butler, Indiana. His faithful companion and the children have born up bravely through it all and all of the communities have the sincere thanks of the family for many acts of kindness.

The first funeral services were conducted by his pastor at the home at Waterville. Rev. McCammon read comforting passages from the Word and Rev. Mullholland offered prayer. Dr. McCammon paid a tribute of respect in beautiful words from the Word of God.

At Mt. Pleasant Church near Butler, Friday the second services were conducted when Rev. Argyl Houser of Fort Scott, Kansas gave the eulogy and preached the sermon. Burial in Mt. Pleasant cemetery.

CHANGE IN TELEPHONE EMPLOYES

Rosella Mendelshon, who has been chief operator at the telephone office for the past two years, has severed her connections and Agneta Horn, of Kendallville, took her place Wednesday morning. Viola Coburn, night operator, has also discontinued her job and with the aid of Thelma Curie, the two girls will handle the central.

REGULATING SALE AND HANDLING OF FIREWORKS

Alfred Hogston, State Fire Marshal, has issued the following rules for the display, sale and handling of fireworks, effective June 10, 1930.

1. No fire works shall be put on display before June 20th. The display must be done in such a way that there will be no danger of the goods being exploded by the rays of the sun or other agency, and under such conditions that if from any cause they are exploded, it will not cause the building to get afire. This can be done by putting such fire works in a non-inflammable container completely enclosed above, below and on all sides, except the front in the display window, except when goods are not exposed to the direct sun rays.

2. No fire works shall be displayed or sold on the streets, sidewalks, alleys, yards or vacant lots or such places in any city or town of the state.

3. All dealers must keep fire works stored in non-inflammable containers, if the original shipping cases have been unpacked before June 20th.

4. No fire works that are capable of causing serious injury to the person by explosion shall be sold. This specifically bans the four explosive fire works items known as "Radio Salute," "K O Flash Salute," "O K Flash Salute" and "Victory Flash Salute."

5. No fire works shall be sold to children under the age of twelve years.

6. No fire works shall be sold or exploded at any public filling station or bulk station of Class 1 and 2 Inflammable Liquids.

7. Sales by retail merchants may begin on June 20th but no deliveries shall be made of fire works until July 1st. Sales and deliveries shall terminate July 5th.

8. This Department reserves the right to stop the use, sale or display of fire works by any person doing the same in a careless, or negligent manner, or violating any or all of these rules.

THE KEES PEONY AND IRIS GARDEN

For three weeks the Kees Gardens, have been advertised in all the surrounding papers.

Persons who are lovers of peonies and iris will find some rare specimens in the Kees Gardens, and they are being sold at prices that lovers of these can afford to buy them.

Mrs. Kees takes great pleasure in her garden, and it is frequented by visitors from the surrounding towns.

REPUBLICAN STATE TICKET CHOSEN

Republican party leaders began preparations for the 1930 campaign, with a platform based on improvements in the taxation and school-aid systems, and a list of candidates on the state ticket that included nine incumbents and three new starters.

The candidates nominated at the state convention last Thursday were:

Thomas B. Coulter, Vincennes, Knox circuit judge for judge of the supreme court, first district.

Otto G. Fifield, Crown Point, incumbent, secretary of state.

Archie N. Bobbitt, English incumbent, state auditor.

Charles L. Biederwolf, Fort Wayne, incumbent, clerk of the supreme and appellate courts.

Judge Charles F. Remy, Indianapolis, incumbent, appellate court member.

Judge Willard B. Gemmell, Marion, incumbent, judge of the supreme court, fourth district.

Judge Solon A. Enloe, Danville, incumbent, judge of the appellate court, first district.

Judge Willis C. McMahan, Crown Point, and Judge Alonzo L. Nichols, Winchester, incumbent, judges of the appellate court, second district.

Roy P. Wisehart, Union City, incumbent, superintendent of public instruction.

Harry Nichols, Madison, state treasurer.

PAVED ROAD IS NOW ASSURED CITIZENS

It looks as though Spencerville and St. Joe might have a paved street as well as the rest of the towns and villages of the county. Such was the unanimous vote of the County Council and Commissioners, in a joint meeting held recently.

Not until County Surveyor, Chas. Miser, had begun work on the road, did The News desire to say what action had been taken on the local petition. Monday morning active work began to get the road outlined on paper.

The road referred to is the county road beginning at Widney's Corners, running through St. Joe and Spencerville, to the Allen county line.

There seems to be a unanimous agreement between the county officials that this road should be constructed of concrete, supposedly 18 feet wide and constructed with the idea that the state would eventually take over this system, which will in time connect with the Toledo and Chicago Pike at Butler and also go on north to Road 20.

The local petitioners had in mind in this road, that by placing it where it would serve the local community to the best advantage, that the county officials would feel more like backing the project, which has proven to be the case.

Much discussion has resulted, but the news of the decision of our county board has met with hearty approval.

THE PEACH CROP A TOTAL FAILURE

The early reports, that, the Michigan peach crop had been totally destroyed by the early freeze, is substantiated by W. S. Pullen & Sons, of Camden, Mich., who supply many of our people in this community. An extract from Mr. Pullen's letter to this paper says:

"There were no blossoms at Peach Crest, consequently, no peaches this season. This condition is almost general in Michigan, Indiana and Ohio. Apples are also a short crop here. Many people depend on these fruits for preserving and let the berry season pass, then have nothing to preserve for winter. Berries both wild and cultivated promise quite plenty and should be saved."

Local Briefs

For Sale: 5 year old Jersey cow to freshen August 1st. Chas. Koch. 24t1p.

The Auburn-Fort Wayne road is nearing completion, with the exception of two miles on the north end.

Hazel Storer has returned to Lafayette for the summer where she started to work Thursday in the Union Building, where she was working during school.

Frank Miser after spending a few days at the home of his parents left Sunday to enroll in the Purdue Civil Engineering Camp near Lafayette. All Freshmen Civil Engineers at Purdue University must spend eight weeks in this camp during the summer.

CLIFTON TURNBULL FIGURES IN ACCIDENT

Clifton Turnbull, a St. Joe resident, husband of Hilda Koch, figured in an automobile accident near Greenville, Ohio, Monday evening about 9 o'clock, in which his jaw was broken on both sides and his left shoulder blade was broken, when the car turned over in making an abrupt turn on the pavement.

John Coburn, of St. Joe and Robert King were with him, making a trip to see King's brother, whom he had not seen for years.

King was driving the car when the accident occurred and John Coburn was in the back seat. When John saw what was about to happen he braced himself and when the car stopped, he was standing upright and unhurt.

Turnbull was rushed to the Greenville hospital and his parents called from Dayton. About four o'clock Tuesday morning, Roy Koch was called and he drove with his daughter, Hilda and baby to the Ohio town. Mrs. Turnbull and baby remained for an indefinite time and Roy and John returned home.

The car was damaged some besides breaking one wheel off.

SAM KEESLER IS IN HOSPITAL

A small sliver in the right hand of Sam Keesler last Thursday has put him in the Sanders hospital at Auburn, where he is in quite a serious condition from blood poison.

The poison has settled in his right ankle and they are trying to absorb it thinking they can keep it under control.

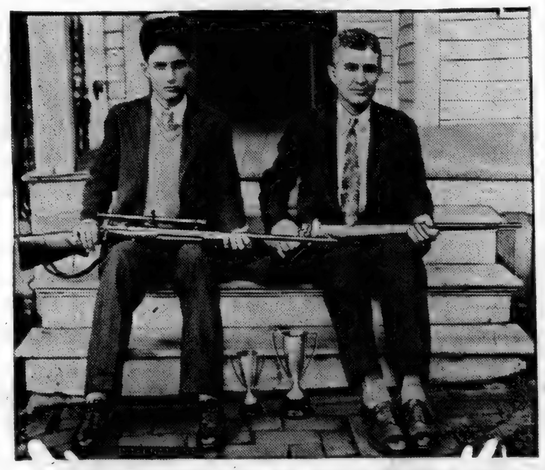
Father and Son Rifle Champions



Two rifle championships in the same family is the unusual record that has been achieved by Samuel A. McKone and his seventeen-year-old son, Samuel A. McKone, Jr. A few hours after the elder McKone had won the senior championship of the Kansas State Rifle association at Junction City, his son won the junior championship. The father's score was 243 out of a possible 250, while the son's was 193 out of a possible 200.

WANTS NORRIS' TOGA

Dr. Jennie Califas of Omaha, Neb., who was ousted as Democratic national committeewoman after she had refused to support Al Smith for President, is seeking the Democratic nomination for senator. That seat is now held by George W. Norris, Republican. Doctor Califas said she would fight for revision of tariff rates to benefit agriculture, as part of her campaign platform.

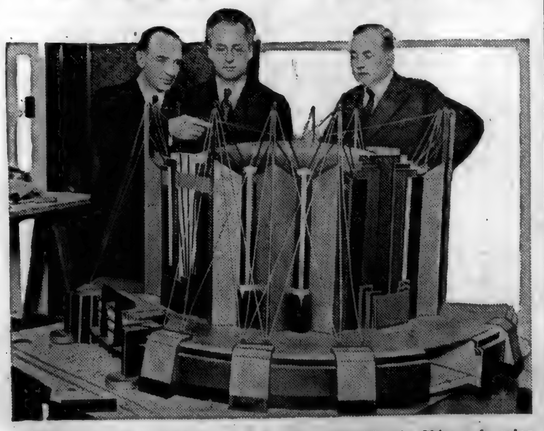
Odd Architecture for Chicago Fair



Architecture for the Century of Progress exposition in Chicago is going to be decidedly different from any that has ever been used. For example, this photograph of the model of one of the domes of the Travel and Transport building shows how cables on the outside will do away with the necessity of having pillars and posts on the inside. The men inspecting the model are Manager L. R. Lohr, Assistant Director of Works C. W. Farrier and Secretary Daniel E. Burnley.

Odd Penalty Inflicted for Picking Tree Leaf

Every leaf you pluck costs you a piece of your shirt!

This stringent and fantastic penalty was exacted for violating the protection bestowed by an emperor on a tree. The tree was an ancient lime tree that stood in the town of Adelsheim in Baden, Germany, and the Emperor Ruprecht decreed its perpetual protection in 1401. So strong was the tradition of this medieval enactment that even at the beginning of the Nineteenth century offenders were still penalized for plucking twigs or leaves; although a modification of the original rule, almost as funtastic as the emperor's whimsical decree itself, let offenders off with whole shirts if they would buy ribbons and tie them to the tree.

By 1867, however, the tree had declined to such a ruinous state that it had to be cut down, and for 50 years or so its place stood empty. Now, however, a new lime tree grows where the "Emperor's Tree" once stood.—Kansas City Star Science Service.

Her Need

Little Betsy had been ill, and with the privilege of an invalid, demanded so much of her mother's time and attention that her older brother, Fred, was a trifle annoyed. One day when Betsy had kept her devoted parent reading aloud to her until she was almost hoarse, Fred remarked succinctly: "Well, mom, I think what Betsy needs is a 'talking picture of you.'"

She Lost 19 Pounds of Fat in 27 Days

During October a woman in Montana wrote—"My first bottle of Kruschen Salts lasted almost 4 weeks and during that time I lost 19 pounds of fat—Kruschen is all you claim for it—I feel better than I have for years."

Here's the recipe that banishes fat and brings into blossom all the natural attractiveness that every woman possesses.

Every morning take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen Salts in a glass of hot water before breakfast.

Be sure and do this every morning for "it's the little daily dose that takes off the fat."—Don't miss a morning. The Kruschen habit means that every particle of poisonous waste matter and harmful acids and gases are expelled from the system.

At the same time the stomach, liver, kidneys and bowels are toned up and the pure, fresh blood containing Nature's six life-giving salts is carried to every organ, gland, nerve and fibre of the body and this is followed by "that Kruschen feeling" of energetic health and activity that is reflected in bright eyes, clear skin, cheerful vivacity and charming figure.

If you want to lose fat with speed get an 85c bottle of Kruschen Salts from any live druggist anywhere in America with the distinct understanding that you must be satisfied with results or money back.

Victory for Eagles

After two years of warfare against a representative of Uncle Sam two bald eagles stand victorious with Uncle Sam's agent in full retreat. The latter, a telegraph operator, has been stationed atop a 40-foot pole to register the shots fired from the naval station at Dahlgren, Va. Upon this perch the eagles built their nest and a conflict has been raging for possession, with the operator forbidden from shooting the birds under a penalty of a $50 fine. So he retreated to a new pole, conceding victory to the eagles.

"Then I'm afraid I've got a bit of bad news for you." He told her by what means the letter had fallen into his hands. "You may think it was not strictly honorable, and I suppose it wasn't, but I had Mary to think about and something told me I ought to. In the end you'll be glad, too."

She read it through and handed it back; she wondered that her hand could be so steady and her face so inscrutable. Yet in her heart she was saying, "I can never be truly happy again, no matter how long the years of my life."

The note was addressed simply, "Andy Orme."

"Dear Andy:" it began. "What's the use of quarreling about the Radway woman now? I was wrong to be so savage about it, but I'm not the cold calculating type like you. We need you to take the yacht to Limon. If you don't it means back to San Quentin for you, for we shall surely be reported and a search made. If you'll fight for her when we get to C. R. I'm willing. Until then let us make peace. Answer immediately.

"HERMAN METZGER."

"I told the boy to come back in half an hour. He will know enough to convince you, if this isn't sufficient. I'll bring him in here and we can cross-examine him."

"What do you want to do?" Mrs. Radway asked in a strained and lifeless voice. Mary looked at her with a sympathy she dared not show. "She really loved him," thought the wise Mary.

"Get the doctor in here and make him answer." Todd thought the thing was obvious. "When we're through with him, we'll hear the boy. Bob, fetch him."

The moments of waiting were the bitterest that any hour of a life, in which sorrow had seldom been absent of late years, had brought Evelyn Radway. The foundations of her faith were shaken. She could not understand by what miracle of self-possession she was able to control herself and compose her features so that the others did not see her secret written there.

Bettington was looking pale and tired. There was a dull pain in his right side which had grown worse since his struggle with Sam; it was some wrenched sinew, he supposed. He tried not to let it be seen. Of them all Mrs. Radway saw he suffered.

"What's this?" he asked essaying cheerfulness. "A council of defense?"

Although he addressed his words to Evelyn Radway, she did not answer. But her face alone showed no emotion. Crosby Todd had triumph written on his, with a tinge of malice in it. Bob felt and expressed contempt; he was angry with himself for having admired the man. And Mary looked at him as one might gaze at some creature of whom deadly qualities are pointed out.

Bettington dropped into a chair wearily. This was to be one more exhibition of Todd's absurdity.

"It seems I'm on trial again," he said, "the pertinacious Todd my accuser"—Bettington looked around—"and the jury ready to convict."

"Why do you call yourself Doctor Waite, when it isn't your name?"

Bettington felt himself flushing like a boy, detected openly in falsehood. He knew his accuser felt he had scored a point.

"What is my name?" he demanded. "I'll admit it isn't Waite."

"Your name is Andy Orme," Todd cried.

Usually ready in any of the emergencies normal men are called on to meet, Bettington found himself utterly unprepared for this. His face showed it. There was confusion written on it and for a moment helplessness and despair. All that he intended to tell them, prefacing it with the story of his abduction, was now useless. They would believe it all part of the monstrous chain of excuses he had woven to lull suspicion.

"It isn't Orme, either," he answered. "You'd better hear the whole thing from the beginning."

He was amazed at Mrs. Radway's suddenly changed attitude.

"Spare us that," she said. Never had he seen her look so cold and unapproachable. She had learned in the space of a few seconds that the man she had idealized was, indeed, a member of this crew of crime. She had no longer any feelings of her own to consider. She must look after Mary Unwin. She reached for the folded letter that lay on the table before Todd.

"May I see that letter?" Bettington asked.

He read it and then angered them by smiling. Now, at least, he knew why he was prejudged.

"This is good news on the whole," he remarked, "there's a chance of saving you."

"For what?" Evelyn Radway asked.

"For any use you may choose to put your life. I mean, I think I can get you to Savannah. If Mr. Todd can be as quick in an emergency as he is with his tongue, and the other lad will risk it, we may be able to seize the ship."

"And leave Mary and Mrs. Radway without protection?" Todd glared at him angrily; such a ruse was too transparent. "Not good enough," he said sarcastically, "Doctor Whatever-you-call-yourself."

"I'd like to tell you my real name," Bettington said, rising stiffly from the chair, wholly unconscious of Todd's threatening gesture. "You won't believe it now."

"Why tell it then?" Todd retorted.

Bettington kept his temper with an effort.

"Because some day, when we get out of this h—l ship, I shall be able to remind you I gave you the opportunity to believe and you would not."

"Does it matter?" Evelyn Radway asked frigidly.

"Not very much, I'm afraid, to you; but it's important to me. I'm a painter by profession, as I think you'll believe. I was at Harvard with the father of these Unwin children, as they can find out if they put me to the test. He would recognize me as Howard Bettington."

"He did before they buried you," Bob broke in, triumphantly. He remembered how broken up his father had been at the sad death of his old friend. Was this man never to make a likely statement? "There's nothing will make us believe you even if we wanted to."

Mary looked at him with deeper horror in her eyes than Bob had shown. She remembered how he had led her to talk of her father; he had seemed so interested in him that she had chattered all sorts of intimate details which he had treasured up to bolster this attempted imposition.

Bettington looked at them wearily. They were willing to believe him guilty of almost any crime, but to all that was true they turned deaf, unfriendly ears.

He shrugged his shoulders and moved toward the door.

"All right. I'll see you get enough food. I suppose no advice of mine is welcome, but remember your ultimate safety depends almost entirely on my efforts and I don't propose to be hampered by any childish actions of young heroes like you. You two are to remain here until I tell you otherwise."

"You're taking a whole lot on yourself," Todd said angrily. "Where do you get your authority?"

"By the right of being the strongest man on this ship and the most desperate." Bettington glared at Crosby Todd in such a way that the younger man felt the element of personal fear possess him. "I am engaged, single-handed, in an effort to bring you to Savannah and I won't have any more scenes like these. I've stood enough from you all. When I give my signal—three double raps—let me be admitted instantly. See that some one is on guard night and day."

His heart was full of bitterness. They would not even give him a chance to explain. Evelyn Radway had changed utterly. He had imagined that from her a spirit of fairness might be expected always.

"We ought not to have let him go," Todd said, when they heard the bulkhead close. "We ought to have held him as a hostage."

Mrs. Radway, thought she had come to the popular way of thinking, was not reconciled to her new leader.

"You would be a child in his hands," she said contemptuously. "Can't you understand that yet?"

"If you still believe in him," Todd said, "there is a new chance to prove you are wrong. This boy Slivers ought to be back if he didn't meet Orme. I'll put him through the third degree and you can ask what questions you like."

It so happened that the furtive Slivers missed the surgeon and came rapping at the steel door. There was no necessity to put him through a severe cross-examination. He had that dramatic sense which finds its metier in publicity. What he had not heard, and what he did not understand about the motives of the crew, he amplified and hardly guessed he was lying.

"Sure he's one of 'em," said the boy eagerly. "Him an' the steward was the bosses. His name's Orme. He was a murderer and forger who broke San Quentin and killed a prison guard. They say he was a big doctor in New York once. The ponies was his ruin—them an' the wheel."

Evelyn Radway was the only one of them who remembered the trial of a celebrated surgeon of brilliant parts and good family; he had killed the man who was threatening to prosecute him for forging a check. And this was the man who had just gone from them promising safety!

"We ought to know how many men there are on board," she declared, "and how their sympathies are. Surely they can't all be bad."

Slivers shook his head knowingly. "They're a pretty hard bunch. The steward he picked 'em 'cause they were tough and he'd got the goods on em. They're afraid to go back."

"Who killed Captain Hallett?" Todd demanded. He saw Evelyn Radway's face grow whiter as he asked it.

"Sam," said Slivers instantly. "Sam is some shot. Say," he added, "do you know why the steward stood there and laughed at the Cap like he did. He'd made Hamner frisk him first. Hamner got the gun the Cap had in his hip pocket, but he never thought he'd pack another. Carried one up on his chest. That fooled Hamner."

"I want the names of the rest of the crew," Mrs. Radway said.

Slivers was ready and willing to help.

"Metzger's the first. Then there's Pereira, the cook. Kenzie makes three. Graumann, Hamner and Krause; that's six, ain't it. Mike, the deck hand, is seven, and Doc eight. There are two men down there with Kenzie or somethin' like that. Just foreigners who don't know no United States. They're scared to come up. Countin' me, there's eleven against you two fellers. Swell chance you've got!"

"Why should we reckon you as one of them?" Mrs. Radway asked. "Can't you see the danger of being associated with men like that? When we get back to New York—"

"But we ain't," said Slivers sagely. "That's the difference. We're goin' to some place in Central America. I told the Doc I was a neutral."

"Suits Me," Kenzie Said Carelessly. "All Right, Cap."

"Tell me about Kenzie," Mrs. Radway said. She remembered that the second engineer had not struck her as being the same depraved sort as his superior. Slivers was ready as usual. It seemed that no crimes of blood were laid to Kenzie's door. His conflict with the law was of a bigamous nature. Wives in many ports clamored for him. For the rest he was a quiet man now engrossed in the adoration of perfect machinery.

Slivers considered Metzger, Pereira, Graumann, Krause and Hamner to be bad men capable of anything. Mike was easily led.

"And the doctor?" asked Todd.

"He's playing a deep game," said the lad. "Metzger's afraid of him." The lad saw he was upon delicate ground. New conventions hedged him around. Here, in the presence of the desired woman he dared not recount the precise reasons for Metzger's jealousy. But when he left he could have rendered Bettington no greater disservice. He had painted him as the sinister and dominating figure who brooded over the strange cruise of the Albatross, betraying now qualities of honesty and courage, and then moods of baffling violence and rage. It was this sense of contrast which most appealed to the boy Augustus Condon.

"Well," Crosby Todd said, when he had gone. "I suppose there's no question that my suspicions were correct?" His words were aimed solely at Mrs. Radway.

"I am afraid not," she said, "but there's no evidence yet that we shall suffer any harm from him. He knows I am ready enough to pay any ransom he demands."

* * * * * * *

In the luxurious quarters aft Bettington came upon Metzger and Pereira sprawling on the great wicker chairs.

"Well?" said Bettington, "what's your proposition?"

"You read the letter?"

"In which you ask me to take you to a convenient place where you can signal to a pilot and then get rid of me. I knew very well that was what Sam meant and I know you two precious birds have the same idea. Here are my terms. I'll take you to land in my own way. I will have nobody on the upper deck. If you have men to spare, use them for stoking. I shall not leave the post."

"But who will take a spell when you sleep?"

"I'll get that boy Bob up. If you want me, send a message by Slivers when he brings food. You've seen that I'm able to take care of myself. Well, I'll treat either of you just as I did Sam, if you as much put your foot on the main companion."

The twain protested, but in the end they gave in.

Bettington had heard no fearsome stories of violence where Kenzie was concerned. He remembered that the man was in the habit of marrying in his moments of sea leave and regretting it in haste. No such charges were over him as troubled the others. But he feared waiting wives more than jail terrors.

"I'm in control," Bettington said to him. "I want all the steam you can give me. Have you enough help?"

"I've got these hunkies," Kenzie answered.

"If you want anything send word by the boy Slivers, I'm not allowing anyone on the upper deck."

"Suits me," Kenzie said carelessly. "All right, Cap."

He was already urging his men to activity. He cared little what went on outside his province.

Bettington immediately went to the barred door and rapped as he had arranged. Todd let him in.

"I've made terms with them," Bettington announced. "I'm to take charge. Nobody is allowed on the upper deck. I need help; I've selected Bob."

"What am I to do?" Bob asked.

"Take your turn at the wheel and wake me if you see or hear anything suspicious. You'll sleep up there, so bring all the kit necessary. As for you, Todd, you stays here and never desert your post for a moment. I said I had made terms with them. That's only partly true. I've forced them for the moment to agree with me. They'll start plotting in a few hours, so continue to be on the watch. Under no condition should you go outside this part of the ship, Mrs. Radway. When the time comes that it's safe, you will be told. Slivers is a kind of official messenger. You can use him if necessary."

When the doctor left them, Crosby Todd was especially vehement in his denunciation of the scheme that robbed them of Bob.

"You don't think Bob's in danger?" Mary demanded.

"Not exactly that, but don't you see he wants to curry favor? He'll try and make Bob think he's a misunderstood hero."

"Not after reading that letter," Bob answered. "No chance!"

CHAPTER XI

Bettington Captures the Cook

In a sense the breach between Bettington and Mrs. Radway left him better able to carry out his plans. He was, at least, relieved of the necessity of trying to convince her of his integrity. They had condemned him already and no more would he have to seek for excuses.

In keeping the upper deck free of the crew he was seeking to lessen the risk of sudden attack. There was always a danger that men who had been so much at sea would notice he was not steering a southern course, and his arbitrary ruling about keeping the deck clear must have engendered misgiving among men whose natures were given to suspicion and fear of the motives too obvious to them.

They would make a concerted rush some night. Perhaps not all would come by the easily watched companion. They would swarm over the stanchions in the darkness and that would be the end of Howard Bettington, painter of seascapes.

Bob, on his way to the bridge, paused a horrified second when he saw Sam's twisted body. Under Crosby Todd's advice he had determined to be very brusque and unbending with the doctor. He was to seek to give the impression of one working for the common good, but not to be influenced by threats or a show of consideration.

Contrary to Todd's declaration that the doctor would try and ingratiate himself, there was no welcoming smile.

"What do you know about the compass?" he was asked. It was humiliating to admit that he knew nothing. For almost an hour Bettington talked to him. "You will take a few hours at the wheel during the day. At night you can sleep. Wake me up directly you see a face anywhere near. I've forbidden this deck to every one except Slivers and I'm far from trusting him yet."

"What would anyone want?" Bob asked. He was still staunch in his belief that Crosby Todd's suspicions were correct ones.

"To kill me and you first. After that, break in down below. Look here, Bob. I'm not in any mood for conversation, but let me tell you this. I'm to be obeyed absolutely. If Todd comes looking up the companion and I see him, I shall shoot. If he comes when I'm sleeping send him back; for I shall most certainly discipline him." When he saw Bob quail at this he smiled. "What would you expect from a desperado like me?"

When Slivers came up with a tray of food he was minded to be loquacious. The cook and Metzger were gambling. Krause, Hamner, Mike and Graumann, too, were playing. Only Kenzie and his hunkies were working.

"Tell Metzger to send some of them up here—two only—to heave Sam over the side."

Metzger had forgotten all about Sam. Now he recalled with sudden pleasure that in Sam's pockets was gold enough to continue that game and win back what Pereira had taken. Hamner was sent on deck with Mike. Hamner was instructed to remove the gold. He reported that a more enterprising person had been there first.

Infuriated, the engineer accused the cook. It was well known that the cook had very little and yet, before luck turned his way, he had lost a lot. Murder might have been done but for Pereira admitting that what he had he took from Augustus Condon, whom he had caught robbing Sam.

Thus it was that Slivers, making sandwiches, was seized upon and put to the torture. He admitted quickly that he had robbed Sam, but put the amount at a larger sum than it was. Pereira thus had to pay back not only all of Sam's money, but nearly all his winnings. Metzger, now serene in triumph, would not allow the boy to be hurt. But Slivers saw murder written in Pereira's look. He abandoned his sandwiches and slipped off.

On deck he went straight to Bettington.

"The cook's going to murder me," he said, trying to smile. "I'd like to stay up here. He's scared of you."

"That might be managed if I could trust you," Bettington stifled the boy's protestations. "Talk makes no impression on me. I want action. You say the cook is going to murder you. Why not beat him to it? I'm not wanting you to kill him. Make him chase you up here and I'll attend to him. You've got to make him so mad that he forgets it's against orders to come on deck."

The idea met with the approval of the boy instantly. There was sport in it. And to be able to tease the cook as long as he wanted to! To bait him and make him rush enraged to his fate! Slivers had no definite idea why it was the surgeon espoused his cause. He supposed it was the result of some quarrel to which he had not been witness.

Bob saw the doctor take a coil of rope and cross the main companion. It was as though a cat watched for a mouse to come out of its hole.

Slivers found the cook in the storeroom where the stock of wine was kept. He clenched his fists and darted about the huge form of the cook as he had seen a favorite lightweight do; his footwork was marvelous. He only stopped when the cook, after the pause rage and astonishment induced, gave chase. Like a skillful decoy, Slivers led Pereira to the companion and then actually struck him a quick blow in that great and proud middle.

At the top of the steps Antonio da Silva Pereira was seized with incredible suddenness. He was tripped up. The fall deprived him of breath. When he recovered it, he was neatly bound hand and foot, a gag was thrust between his teeth and he could only roll the black eyes, with their yellowish whites, in impotent fury.

Clover Held as Sacred by the Ancient Greeks

According to legend St. Patrick had great trouble in teaching the people of Ireland the doctrine of the Trinity. Then one day he saw a tiny three-leafed plant growing at his feet and plucking it he used it to illustrate his point. Shamrock is from the Irish "seamrog," and is applied to the various plants having three leaves. In Arabic, the word for three-leaf plants is "shamrakh." While the name shamrock has been applied to various three-leaf plants, it is generally used in connection with one of the clovers. The four-leaf clover has long been associated with various superstitions. Because it is in the form of a cross is likely the reason for attributing to such plants uncanny powers. It was, however, regarded as sacred by the Greeks long before the time of Christ. At various times it has been believed that the person carrying it would have the power of detecting the presence of evil spirits or would be successful in his undertakings. If he put it under his pillow, he would dream of his beloved and a maiden might, by slipping it, unseen, into the shoe of her lover, assure him a safe journey.

Good Grounds

The young wife was seeking a separation from her husband on the grounds of cruelty.

"But isn't your husband the captain of Brownton Harlequins?" asked the judge, with awe, being himself a keen follower of rugby football.

"Yes, your honor," was the reply; "and that was where the trouble started. I could do with him showing me how well he had tackled by tackling the dog; but when he used baby to show me how he threw the ball into the scrum—well, that was the end."—London Mail.

Fighting Forest Fires

The majority of people believe forest fire fighting to be just a laborer's job, but nothing could be further from the truth. It is on a strictly scientific basis and nothing is done at random. There is a definite system of organization which designates to each man a certain tool to use and a certain position in the crew. The crews usually consist of from 6 to 12 men, under supervision of a warden or a ranger. On a small fire, ten acres or less in area, one crew is usually enough, but on large fires, anywhere from 50 to 300 men, are employed. The implements used are axes, brush-hooks, shovels, rakes, water tanks and torches for setting backfires. The proper use of the latter is the best means of controlling forest fires.

Lesson for June 15

JESUS ON THE CROSS

LESSON TEXT—Matthew 27:1-66.

GOLDEN TEXT—Looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith; who for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus on the Cross.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus on the Cross.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—The Suffering of the Cross.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Calvary.

The grand climax of the six months' lessons is reached in this one. To miss the significance of the crucifixion of Christ will be to render valueless all the preceding lessons. It is not a matter of learning the lessons taught by a great teacher or imitating the examples of a great and good man, but of apprehending the atonement made by the world's Redeemer.

I. The Place of Crucifixion. (vv. 33, 34).

They led Him away to Golgotha, a hill north of Jerusalem, resembling a skull. He was crucified "without the gate" (Heb. 13:12). At first He was compelled to bear His own cross, but when physical weakness made it impossible for Him to continue, they compelled Simon the Cyrenean to bear it for Him (v. 32). In order to strengthen Him for the ordeal before He was nailed to the cross, the soldiers offered Him a stimulant of vinegar mixed with gall. He refused the stimulant offered and consciously drank the cup of sin to its bitter dregs.

II. Gambling for the Clothing of the Lord (vv. 35, 36).

It was the custom for the soldiers who had charge of a crucifixion to receive the garments of the one crucified. We have here a fulfillment of Psalm 22:18. What sacrilege for them to gamble for His seamless robe under the very cross where He was dying!

III. The Accusation (v. 37).

It was customary to place over the victim on the cross his name and indicate his crime. This superscription was placed over Jesus by Pilate to vex the Jews. He was their King in absolute truth. They had long looked for Him and now, when He had come, this is the kind of treatment they gave Him.

IV. Two Malefactors Crucified With Him (v. 38).

We are not told who they were. Perhaps they belonged to the band of Barabbas. This was another fulfillment of Scripture (Isa. 53:12). In these three crosses we have set forth a spiritual history of the whole world.

V. The Dying Savior Reviled (vv. 39-44).

This reviling was engaged in by the passerby, the chief priests, the scribes, elders, and the malefactors who were crucified with Him.

1. "He saved others, Himself He cannot save" (v. 42).

This jest was meant to show the absurdity of Jesus' claims, but it demonstrated them and showed the reason for His suffering. He could not save Himself and others, so He chose to give Himself to save others.

2. "If he be the king of Israel, let him now come down from the cross" (v. 42). His refusal to abandon the cross established His rightful claims. The devil offered Him the kingdoms of the world if He would escape the cross (Matt. 4:8-10). Through His death He came into His place of kingship over all who bow to Him.

3. "He trusted in God. Let him deliver him now" (v. 43).

His obedience unto death was the sacrifice which met God's full approval.

VI. The Death of Christ (vv. 45-50).

Who is sufficient to comment upon this tragedy! Let us contemplate it in adoration and wonder. So shocking was this crime that nature threw around the Son of God a shroud that the godless company could not gaze upon him. Darkness was upon the land at noonday. Upon the termination of the darkness, He cried with a loud voice, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" He became sin for the world and the world's sin hid God's face from Him. God forsook Him, turned from Him who had taken the sinner's place. God was dealing with sin on the innocent substitute. No one can understand that but God, but we can believe. When the price of sin was paid, He cried out with a loud voice, showing that He still had vitality; that His death was not from exhaustion, but by His sovereign will. He yielded up the ghost and sent away His spirit.

Kindness

Full half our holiness is shown in simple, everyday relations with our fellow men; and nine times out of ten the best immediate expression for our love of God and gratitude to Christ is found in some small kindness to our neighbor.—Isaac Edwards.

God Can Be Trusted

The God who ordained the beginning can safely be trusted with the end, as with all that lies between.—Christian Evangelist.

Some one said that they thought the Doxology is a scientific treatise on the doc weed.

A Scotchman joined a band because he heard that the drummer was going to make a few rolls.

The thing that makes every thing in the whole world thin is trying to make too much of a spread.

Suggestion to educators: For the next school year have the recipients for education use Brilliantine on their scalps.

To underestimate yourself is as bad as over estimating yourself. Low blood pressure is as dangerous as high blood pressure.

Competition is not an evil. It will always be with us in business. Competition is like a shirt—always acceptable as long as it is clean.

There are quite a number of popular expressions being used now days. We hear expressions of the "ghost walks," "a nose knows," "money talks," "beaks speak." About the next thing we will hear will be the expression, when guts strut.

Every man has an indisputable privilege. If he should find that this country and its constitution do not suit him, he can sojourn to another country unquestioned and unmolested. Constitutionally speaking, if any man in America does not want to do as the Americans do, then let him go to Rome and "do as the Romans do."

An announcement: Young person to be sold at auction, regardless of the price it brings. No up set price, no by bidding and no protection. Very liberal terms will be given and your character will be required as down payment on date of sale as evidence of good faith– in the bird that tries to sell you.

There lies in the life of every man the advice he needs for his own advisement in matters pertaining to his own life. The advice of other people repells, but their example inspires. Life is before you. What are you going to do with it and your self. Every man is equipped with a receiving set for receiving truth and a loud speaker to radiate the truth. Duty is something that cannot be shaken off—meet it.

In the classified straw votes taken by the Digest in addition to the main vote, it was found that the majority of the bankers, clergy, and educators favored leaving the law just as it is. On the other hand, the lawyers and physicians voted to repeal the law. Are we to understand by this that the doctors of law and medicine anticipate a larger business in case the law is repealed? If this be true, this rather whispers something in favor of Pro Hi Bish.

Cook county republicans took the first step toward letting the world know how Illionis felt about Prohibition by petitioning for a referendum vote on three questions in the coming election in November. The first question is whether the eighteenth amendment ought to be repealed. Second, shall congress modify the Volstead act by giving the individual states the power to determine for themselves what alcoholic content of beverages is intoxicating. Third, whether the state legislature shall repeal the Illinois prohibition law, some times called the "search and censure act." There is no question before the American people which is receiving the attention of or demanding referendum votes. Home and foreign money are trying to buy and pry their way into this country thru the negligence of gone-to-seed citizens and religion adherents whose powder has got wet.

Well the frost seems to be all out of the ground for the summer.

Laborers: Better have your wages sprayed before the cut worms go to working on them.

Some people would even consent to living in the penitentiary if they could get rich over the deal.

A buzzard is the only bird that hangs around anything after it is dead, all the rest of the birds are of the living.

The bible says, "If thy hand offend thee, cut if off." That's alright, but how are we going to get rid of our stomachs.

Everybody expects the spirit to move them from time to time. We can next expect to be moved by the spirit of 1776, about election time.

Now what do you think o' that. Just got through folding up our napkins, thinking it was all over. Now we will have to solve another "Riddle" this fall.

Brother Farley seems to be rather satisfied in the turn of affairs ni the adjustment of the error giving Riddle the crown. He might have the "peace at any price" idea in mind.

All is fair in love, war and politics, we just wait patiently until the bell starts the next round. If ever there was a line up of two candidates being diametrically opposed on the prohibition issue, it can be said to be now. In this twelfth district, at least, there will be no need for a request for a referendum vote on the wet and dry issue.

There is never a thing so bad but what there is some good in it. So we can say that one of the good things we can say about the wet times that wet ambassadors advocate is that the wet times might take the starch out of some people sufficiently for them to see the benefits of the good old prohibition days which had been left behind. Better leave good enough alone. John.

Every man owes his loyalty to his country and the church for which it stands and NOT to any political party, especially when it comes to choosing between them. Every citizen is under oath to his country but he has never been under oath to any political party. Political parties, while they are a necessity in the manipulation of the political machinery in choosing the servants of the people, they cannot be considered as anything sacred, especially demanding great loyalty of national esteem. The boy scouts of this nation take an oath as the following: We owe our allegiance to the flag and to the country for which it stands, etc. What this country needs is a lot more boy scouts and about 35,000,000 good scouts as citizens voting.

Cannon walks out on committee who interrogates him on his political and financial activities in 1928 election. As we know, there was conducted a senatorial quiz into the wet affairs of the last election. It seems that Cannon did not refrain from telling the truth concerning the matter, assuming that the country was still a land of the free and the home of the brave. It's reported that in other inquiries by investigating committees that there has been considerable padding of both accounts and stories. It is remembered that Bishop Cannon organized the south against Al Smith in '28. In the inquiry he contended that he was being "persecuted by a wet Roman Tammany element" denying that the committee had any right to probe in his activities, and figuratively told the inquisitors to mind their own business. This no doubt will be an eye opener to the country, in as much as it reveals that the Protestant church will continue to have opposition, from which it fled on the Mayflower in 1620.

The inhumanity of humanity: At the close of the day, when we have everything stacked up for the night and the jest, compliments and criticisms of our neighbors have all been passed on and forgotten and we "wrap the draperies of our couch about us and lie down in pleasant dreams" did it ever occur to you that there were souls in the world that were dragging bodies around that did not have a couch, draperies, meal ticket, nor a job and not even a friend that had a job. We all like to be members of the laughing squad, when laughing is in order, because the laugh is on the other fellow—he's setting 'em up. But no one knows the battles he fights, the idle days and sleepless nights he spends in trying to be the better man. Heredity, adversity, youthful habits, forced idleness, unfaithful friends, all seem to conspire against him in his effort to get up, be up, and stay up in the world. New clothes, rent, no job in sight, out of work, pay me next, grocery bills, past due installments, all stalk past like well organized imps, each taking their turn. Are there any in the world just like this who could logically be faultless themselves for their unfortunate conditions? Such might be the case. Does criticism ever solve a single problem?

Why men leave home is perfectly easy but why they come back the second time is far beyond our reason.

Forbidden fruit again becomes the center of discussion again. Dr. Ditlef Neilson in Denmark at the head of research work, says that recent discoveries reveals the fact that a fruit known as a pine cone was responsible for Adam's fall instead of the apple. Well that's that. Now we can go on and sleep well nights.

Pentecost Observed Around World

The Church of Christ launched a world wide movement for the observance of the day of pentecost on last Sunday which was observed by the entire Protestant world. Other churches were invited to join in the celebration and around the world at the same hour the bible was read and communion was observed by all the protestant christian bodies. This observance while it marked no special mile stone in the advancement of the church, it is considered the greatest unified movement of a world wide scope in church propaganda. Whether or not all the protestant world takes the movement to be of any major importance or not, the fact remains that this event will go down in history as a single event having a great significance. Whether the activities of the church always meets the approval of all its constituant elements or not, the future will prove that the church has some improvement to make in the world and even in its own organization. The retrogrative mind of today will find that the church is getting ready for another conquest of the world in greater intensity than ever before known. The question of the day is has the church a knowledge and a faith that assures it of its great power or has it a consciousness of its capabilities?

Tax Facts

In a recent article, Merle Thorpe, editor of Nation's Business, brings out some interesting facts about taxation.

The tax collector, according to Mr. Thorpe, takes from each of us a day's labor out of each week. We earn about 80 billion dollars a year and the tax bill is 13 billions —almost one-sixth.

Out of every 11 persons working, one is a public employe. A comparatively few years ago the ratio was one in 22. If the modern trend toward a bigger bureaucracy continues, probably one person in every five will soon be living off the rest of us.

Mr. Thorpe blasts the old supposition that taxes are paid by the corporations and the wealthy, and points out that every dollar taken in taxes from railroad or any other business, must be collected, in turn, from the customers of that business.

Sixteen cents out of every American dollar goes to the government. That's a fact worth thinking about before enlarging governmental functions in any direction.

The children's exercises at Concord Sunday evening was quite a success. The children did fine, and collection was good. A large crowd, some from Harlan, Auburn and quite a few from St. Joe, enjoyed the program.

STRAIGHT HOSE SEAMS SPELL SMARTNESS

"Show me what she wears and I'll tell you what she is" would be a safe proposition for almost any woman to make about another. In the matter of girdles and supporter belts, for example, it is not difficult to judge whether their owners are young or old, fat or thin, fastidious or soberly practical. Most slim young things have a penchant for the Hickory garter belt, either instead of or in addition to the round garter, and this she wears especially for sports and daytime wear.

The college girl or debutante insists on style and beauty in her hose supporter, as well as the greatest possible comfort and freedom of movement. An inch circlet of silk elastic, rosebud trimmed, has four adjustable hose supporters which hold the stockings firmly in place. To avoid runs in stockings, one should select a supporter buckle having both loop and button protected with rubber, and with all metal parts rounded instead of with sharp edges to tear the fragile silk or scratch the fingers.

To make doubly sure that the hose seams are straight and parallel, many women prefer to wear a Hickory round garter as well as the hose supporter.

MAKING BROILERS

(By Prof. H. D. Munroe)

As soon as the cockerels can be easily distinguished, and as early as it may be practicable to handle two flocks instead of one, the young flock should be divided so as to separate the cockerels from the pullets. The cockerels may then be finished for market. The pullets need not, and should not, be forced for fat and flesh production.

In order that the cockerels may be forced for quick growth it will be necessary to give them special feeding. The growing mash should be before them dry at all times. A moist mash fed two or three times a day will help a lot. This should be made up of ½ growing mash, and ½ crate fatener mixed with milk. The birds will relish one feeding a day of scratch grain. The success of growing broilers fast depends upon the amount of feed they will consume.

When properly grown, broilers should average one pound in about six weeks and two pounds in eight or ten weeks. It is not only more profitable to dispose of the cockerels at an early age, but it saves feed and labor and helps to overcome the common habit among poultry of overcrowding.

Whenever broilers are forced for quick growth and fleshing it is desirable to sell them at the farm if possible. The birds shrink rapidly in shipment. The question of shrinkage in transit is most important. The rate of shrinkage varies from zero to as high as 20%. Much of the loss can be averted by good care and management at shipping time.

It is a good plan to feed the birds just before shipment all that they will eat of whole grain soaked in water. If the birds are to be on the road six hours or more, fill a can with soaked grain and fasten it inside the shipping crate.

NOVEL PLAY APRON FOR LITTLE GIRLS

"Just like Mother" is reason enough for little girls to do a good many things, including the very sound and helpful practice of helping with the dishes now and then. With a little Hickory rubber apron to wear, a dainty, yet practical replica of Mother's big one, she will be delighted to take on this small task, and also to wear it when she is doing the necessary washing and ironing for a large family of dolls.

In the style shown here, one of many available, the little apron is slipped over the head and fastened at the side, affording complete protection to the little frock underneath and yet, cool and uncontining. It has the daintiest of ruffles all the way round and a front ornamented with appliqued rubber motifs designed to capture the childish feminine heart.

These aprons, which are as suitable for play as for work, can be easily washed by using lukewarm water and soap flakes. Do not wring them out, but squeeze gently and wipe with a dry cloth. They should not be ironed.

Wind is a Close Second to Fire

In destuction and damage to property, high winds are almost as culpable as fire. A wind need not be of tornado force to do serious damage; nor is wind damage a hazard peculiar to any section of the country. Exceedingly high and dangerous wind movements have occurred in almost every section of the country and history will undoubtedly repeat itself. Windstorm Insurance is very moderate in cost.

HISTORY'S MYSTERIES

Unsolved Riddles That Still Puzzle Authorities Here and Abroad

The Arms of the Venus di Milo

THAT the Venus di Milo, undoubtedly the most beautiful statue in the world, once had arms is apparent from the most superficial glance, but in what position they were sculptured and what became of them are mysteries which take first rank among the secrets of the art world.

Some experts, basing their statements upon accurate measurements of the stumps of the missing arms and the manner in which the muscles appear along the back of the statue, claim that the right arm was gracefully posed and attached to the draperies around the waist, while the left arm was raised at the shoulder and bent at the elbow—suppositions which are supported by the meager reports concerning the statue when it was first discovered on the Island of Melos in the Mediterranean.

But the first of the mysteries concerning the Venus is connected with the origin of the statue. Who was the sculptor? It is doubtful if this will ever be revealed for, while it has evidently been buried for some 2,000 years and it bears traces of the characteristic handiwork of any one of several famous Greek sculptors, the identity of the man who made it will remain forever a secret unless some unsuspected evidence is discovered, throwing light upon this question.

The modern history of the Venus goes back about a century when Yorgos Bottonia, a peasant living on the Island of Melos, was working in a field on the side of a mountain. Bottonia was quarrying some stone and accidentally came across a species of vault. Excavating further, he was amazed to discover the figure of a woman, larger than nature and radiant with the beauty of the immortals.

Who had sealed her there? Why for some twenty centuries, had that marvelous form been a captive of the dark, standing motionless and unhonored? Had the statue been stolen and secreted or had it been hidden in order to save it from the hands of vandals? These questions, like the others which concern the Venus of Melos, must also remain unanswered.

When old Yorgos found the statue—or so the story goes—it was complete and unharmed. What was more, it was made of two superimposed blocks, joined at the waist, while the left arm could be detached from the shoulder to which it was cunningly fixed by an iron tenon.

Shortly after the discovery, however, a French vessel stopped at the Island of Melos and a young ensign started on a tour of discovery for something out of the ordinary. He heard of the Venus and at once sought out Yorgos. A bargain was struck and the statue was to pass into the hands of the ensign as soon as he could produce the purchase price agreed upon—a sum absurdly small when the real value of the statue is considered. The French vessel then sailed for Constantinople where the French ambassador was informed of the treasure and, in a few days the secretary of the embassy was sent to Melos to complete the transaction.

When he arrived he found that the primates of the island had arranged to present the statue to a certain Greek prince, whom they desired to placate. A French warship had been dispatched to Melos to bring the statue away with it but, when she anchored in the harbor on May 23, 1820, a Greek ship flying the Turkish flag was already at the dock and a party of Greek and Turkish sailors were preparing to load the statue on the Greek boat. Both French and Turkish sailors were landed and a fight ensued for possession of the treasure, the French being victorious.

When the melee was over and the French vessel sailed for Piraeus, it is said that the Venus bore irreparable wounds. But this is part of the secret which surrounds the statue for, as the story of the affair did not come to light until nearly half a century later, the details could never be substantiated and there is more than a suspicion that the statue was broken during its trip on the warship and that the story of the fight was concocted in order to explain the mishap. In fact, the only undisputed points about this famous statue are that it was discovered on the Island of Melos and that it now stands, broken but magnificent, in the place of honor in the Louvre at Paris. All the rest is conjecture, rumor and mystery.

The Malady Fascinating

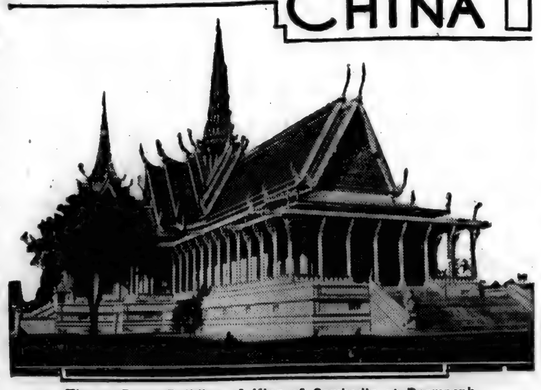
The following letter was recently received by a city health officer from a colored woman who had been attending his clinics:

"Dear Sir: I have been ill, so bad to forfeit two treatments, but hope you will excuse me, for my ability to walk was very questionable, seemed as though my knees were captivated with rheumatism, the tension of the cords seemed obtrusive. Truly—"—Health News.

Device Prolongs Tones

The crea-tone is a device to prolong tones on the pianoforte. Its principle is said to be based on catching the normal vibration of the string after the hammer has set it in motion and prolonging the tone electrically while the key is depressed. It is the invention of Simon Cooper, Brooklyn scientist and engineer.

FRENCH INDO-CHINA



Throne Room Building of King of Cambodia at Pnompenh.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

FRANCE has recently found it necessary to send a punitive expedition across the border that lies between Indo-China and China because of the activities of Chinese Communists along the frontier.

The expedition operated from Tongking, northernmost of the French coastal colonies, but the step was taken as a protection for the whole of French Indo-China, that stretches from the southeastern corner of Asia some 800 miles to the north and northwestward. It is a sizable empire which France controls there in Asia, either by outright possession or protectorate—265,000 square miles, an area almost exactly the size of the state of Texas. The region is, however, much closer to the equator than Texas, occupying a position corresponding to that of southern Mexico and Central America. Thus the French Asiatic empire is wholly within the tropics and in a region of heavy rainfall.

The units of French Asia are Cochin China, in the extreme south; Cambodia, in the southwest; Annam, stretching along most of the eastern coast; Laos, inland and to the northwest; and Tongking, filling the northern end of the elongated territory and extending from the coast inland for 200 miles.

Annam is less completely under French control, officially, than any of the other states with which it is associated in the territorial group known as French Indo-China. It has its own emperor and is listed as a protectorate. But Annam and the twelve million people of Annamese blood really constitute the chief factor in this region of French influence. In few places are the old forms of oriental magnificence maintained as completely as in the imperial establishment at Hue, the capital of Annam. Until recently the palace was forbidden ground, and it is still far from easy to obtain access.

Inside the palace walls is a richness and an elaborateness seldom encountered outside fairy tales and the settings of extravagant stage presentations. There are picturesque gardens; paved courts, where on occasion the ten thousand mandarins of Annam strike their foreheads in unison on the ground before the emperor; dim corridors of countless columns with their huge perfume burners sending up continual clouds of incense; and exquisite rooms of intricately wrought ceramics and gold and silver. Opening into the emperor's state rooms is the great Golden Door, through which, in addition to the sovereign, only the extraordinary ambassadors may pass.

Lavish festivals and displays take place within this fairyland of luxury. The most charming and characteristic, perhaps, are the children's ballets, in which scores of dainty, costumed youngsters go through elaborate steps and postures with bright fans in their hands and a lighted colored lantern attached to each youthful shoulder.

Hue Itself Not Beautiful.

Outside the palace enclosure Hue is less appealing. The "metropolitan area" of the city is in large part a collection of native villages clustered in the shadow of the great palace-citadel walls. Across the river is the French residency with its Gallic-western atmosphere. For a long time Hue was little known, and as the seat of an important country its size was exaggerated. Its population is only about 60,000.

The town is in a tropical region in a latitude corresponding to the southern extremity of Mexico. It lies near the mid-point of the long double-curving coast of French Indo-China, a few miles from the sea on the Hue river. Built on a flat, the city itself has little beauty of form or setting; but it would be difficult to find in the tropics more beautiful environs than it possesses. Only a few miles away rise the mountains from which the Hue river flows, and even closer are lower wooded hills and valleys. Numerous villages are all but hidden in a mantle of green: palms, bamboos, and scores of tropical vines and shrubs. Carefully kept paddy fields alternate with wild regions of underbush, and scattered about the countryside are innumerable graceful pagodas.

The most remarkable feature of Hue are the famous tombs of the kings, which lie in the charming pine and banyan-covered valleys and hills a few miles from the city—true cities of the dead, far more attractive in setting than that of the living. For each departed ruler of the past several centuries a large area has been developed as a resting place and memorial for himself, his wives, children and servants. These developed areas are in two parts. One is a beautiful group of gardens, lakes, summer-houses and a memorial hall. The latter is fitted with the furniture from the departed emperor's apartments. The second part is a vast enclosure near-by, usually a series of terraces above the gardens, in some unmarked spot of which the body of the emperor lies. The reigning emperor visits each of these garden-tombs of his ancestors annually and makes obeisance to their spirits.

The notable structures and gardens extend from the end of the Eighteenth century to the present. The earlier of these are exceedingly elaborate and have much in them to remind one of Fontainebleau and Versailles.

Cambodia's Capital.

Strikingly different from Hue is Pnompenh, capital of Cambodia. It lies on the route to the famous ruins of Angkor and is better known to tourists than some of the larger capitals of Indo-China.

The palace of the kings of Cambodia is not elaborate. The royal dwelling place, in fact, is a series of rather modest buildings, not richly adorned without or within. Greatest of the palace sights is a life-size gold statue of Buddha in a room whose floor is of silver tiles.

Five or six hundred female retainers occupy the royal colony, among whom are the dancing girls. They, in their golden gowns, royal jewels, and tiaras that resemble miniature carved steeples, have become famous for their charm and grace.

Near-by is the Khmer museum with a collection of sculptured stones, implements of war and jewelry; the weather-beaten royal pagoda, and an ancient temple approached by a long flight of steps with a stone railing representing Naga, the sacred seven-headed cobra. Tails of the sacred reptile adorning the roofs of some of Pnompenh's buildings resemble crooked lightning rods on American farm houses.

The one thoroughfare of Pnompenh that has a right to be called an avenue leads from the palace to the public park. Two hotels bordering it offer excellent accommodations for a small Eastern city save for their orchestras that dispense impossible nocturnal jazz. The rest of the street is cluttered up with open-front native shops, some of which make an attempt to duplicate French pastry. Now and then through a vacant space one gets a glimpse of a garden spot a block or two in the background where a French colonial official lives in a palatial home amid broad lawns and flowering trees.

Hanoi, the "Paris of Asia."

The administrative center of all French Indo-China, and the capital as well of Tongking, is Hanoi which has been dubbed "the Paris of Asia." It bears many of the earmarks of the European capital.

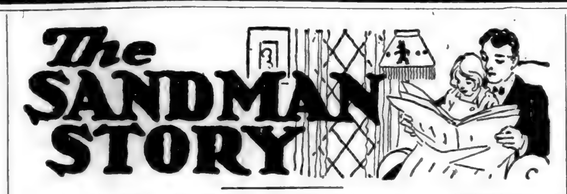
A modern train brings you into a modern railway station at Hanoi. There you may hail a shiny new French-made automobile with a French chauffeur. In a tour of the city you ride along wide streets and boulevards bearing French names and pass imposing French buildings, and spacious parks where stroll French women and men; some of the latter dressed in the natty blue uniforms of the French army.

In the business district, Parisian gowns are displayed behind plate-glass show windows. French theater fronts blaze with gaudy signs to attract patrons. Paris-like sidewalk cafes invite passersby to imbibe their favorite beverage while melodious strains from a French orchestra filter through the open windows of a French restaurant.

Now and then you bump over street car tracks. You notice the absence of peculiar oriental city odors because of Hanoi's modern sewage system; you feel free to drink the city water because of the excellent water supply system; and at night the streets are bathed in light from thousands of electric bulbs. The Botanical gardens and Zoological park are additional reminders of the French capital about 7,000 miles away.

The French quarter is farthest from the right bank of the Red river on which Hanoi lies about 80 miles from the sea. A lake, surrounded by promenades, separates this quarter from the native quarter which begins on the congested riverside. Once inside the narrow byways of the native quarter, it is easy to forget the westernized portion of the city.

The SANDMAN STORY



ABOUT ZOO ANIMALS

"THERE are certain months in the year I like," said Mrs. Bison, otherwise known as Mrs. American Buffalo.

"And what, pray tell, are they?" asked Mrs. European Bison.

Mrs. European Bison is of the buffalo family and is a near relative of Mrs. American Buffalo. Her legs are longer, her body shorter, her hair on her head and back is not so thick, while the hair on the end of her tail is thicker.

She is a good deal shorter on the whole.

Mr. and Mrs. European Bison lived in a yard adjoining that of the American Buffalo family. They were all quite friendly.

"Tell me," said Mrs. European Bison, "why you are so fond of certain months of the year."

"I will do that gladly," said Mrs. Bison, or Mrs. American Buffalo. She was usually known as Mrs. Bison while ner neighbor was always called Mrs. European Bison.

'Here Is My Darling Bennie Buffalo."

"Also please tell me which months they are," Mrs. European Bison further requested.

"That I will do gladly, too," said Mrs. Bison. "The months I like are the late spring and early summer months. I believe they call them July, June and May."

"They do," said Mrs. European Bison, "but you are speaking of them backwards. Folks usually speak of them forwards."

"Pooh!" grunted Mrs. Bison. "What care I for folks! Nothing! There!"

"Do continue with your tale," said Mrs. European Bison.

"My tail is quite long enough," said Mrs. Bison. She was a little bit angry.

"I didn't mean your tail—I meant your story. They are the same words when you pronounce them, but have different meaning, according to the way you spell them."

"But you didn't spell them," said Mrs. Bison.

"I thought you understand from the way I used the word. Well, don't let's argue. Go on with your story."

"I like the months I have mentioned," said Mrs. Bison, "because they are the months when the baby buffaloes are born into the big world or this big zoo.

"I shed my coat in the spring and am all ready to look my best. See? Here is my darling Bennie Buffalo," she ended proudly, as she pointed to a buffalo calf not far away. She was certainly a very proud mamma.

Not far away from these yards there was a tree in which was the Raccoon house. And in this tree Daddy Raccoon was now talking with pride.

The little raccoons were twisting their bushy tails and smiling such nice, pleasant happy smiles.

"We have ten rooms in this house," said Daddy Raccoon, and Mrs. Raccoon smiled, too. "It's a very good-sized house and they wanted to show us the honor of giving us a fine home because they think we're an addition to the zoo, and because we're smart. They like our tricks and ways."

"The house is no trouble to take care of," and Mrs. Raccoon, "for the keeper sees that it is kept warm and clean and also sees that the rain can't come in."

"He makes your housekeeping very easy, doesn't he?" asked Mr. Raccoon.

"He does, indeed," said Mrs. Raccoon, "Underneath our house there is our dining room of a nice wooded floor which he always keeps clean, too."

"Yes," said Daddy Raccoon, "and he brings us our food. You don't have to think of the marketing or what you will get for dinner, or anything like that. Nor do I have to think of it!"

"In other words," said Mrs. Raccoon, "to live in the zoo is to live where housekeeping is made easy.

"No worries, no thoughts of where we shall get the next meal.

"Just sleeping and eating and enjoying our smooth tree and each other all the days of our raccoon lives.

"These are our joys and our comforts."

And Daddy Raccoon and all the little raccoons agreed to what Mrs. Raccoon said.

A SYNTHETIC WORLD

IN ALMOST any store you can purchase today artificial silk and artificial wool. Many articles are offered for sale manufactured from artificial leather and artificial horsehair. You can buy synthetic drugs from any drug counter. The essence of wintergreen is very expensive, but the artificial article is comparatively cheap and is as effective as the genuine drug.

L. A. Barrett.

It is very difficult to detect the difference between a real egg and an artificial one especially when used in baking. The one produces about as good an effect as the other, only you cannot produce a chick from the synthetic article. We are now hearing about the possibility of synthetic paper to be manufactured from a substitute for wood pulp. Even synthetic gasoline has been suggested, and when electricity has been successfully subtracted from the sunlight, and properly controlled for distribution, the problem of heating and lighting as well as horse power for the world's machinery will be much simplified.

The last and perhaps most interesting contribution to the field of synthetic products is rubber. Rubber is used in such a variety of articles that it has been estimated this year's demand will exceed 800,000 tons of the raw material. Among the many articles made from rubber, automobile tires consume the larger portion of the available supply. Rubber is imported to this country and tire companies for some time have desired to be less dependent upon a foreign product. They had little hopes of synthetic rubber ever coming into the market, especially, since a noted German chemist in an address before the Carnegie Institute of Technology stated that extensive researches had convinced him that the obstacles to the production of synthetic rubber were almost insuperable. Prior to this incident, it was announced, that "Before the war 500 patents relating to synthetic rubber were issued in Germany, none of which led to the production of a single ton of rubber." It is interesting to note that Thomas A. Edison has undertaken the task of manufacturing this article. He claims it to be the toughest problem he has ever attempted. But, he says, "Give me five more years and the United States will have a rubber crop."

"A BACK NUMBER"

"HE IS a back number and his competition need not be feared."

The reference here was to a person whose ideas and methods were out of date.

And what a curiously eloquent expression it is. For it can be applied to so many phases of activity, in so many fields.

Almost anything can be a back number—a style, a method, a fashion—what not.

A good phrase it is, and it is to the newspaper world that we are indebted for this journalistic metaphor—it being an allusion to a periodical long past current.

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

SHINGLING BY THE MOON

MANY people believe that you should shingle your roof when the moon is on the wane. The shingles put on at that time will lay flat—"go down" as they say—while singles laid when the moon is on the increase are liable to warp and curl up. This superstition has been found existing in this country by the American Folk-Lore society and is another case of the survival into our own times of the primitive doctrine of Lunar Sympathy which considered both human acts and material things as sympathetically affected by the waxing and waning of the moon. When the moon is waxing it gradually increases itself from a thin line into a round ball—and shingles will try to do the same. Whereas when it is on the wane it goes through an opposite process and shingles laid on are correspondingly influenced. It will be noted that by the doctrine of Lunar Sympathy that sympathy is exerted upon material things in a determinate manner at some particular and crucial time of the object's existence—when the timber is cut, when the seed is planted, when the shingle is laid.

Dear Editor:

LITTLE ROCK, Ark., had a good idea recently. They wanted a booster booklet, to be sponsored by the real estate men. So they held a contest among school children to get all sorts of odd information about the city.

The resultant data makes breezy reading. Taxes, length of streets, the number of taxicabs in town, 250 miles of natural gas pipes used in the city, 906 fire hydrants, 14 theaters in town, $1,262 average per capita wealth—the kids routed out these facts and many others.

I imagine the contest resulted first of all in a new pride in those youngsters' hearts.

If the real estate men of any town can just get the youngsters to loving their city, the rest of the world will hear about it, too.—Fred Barton.

BILL, THE BUS DRIVER SAYS

"There's a difference between an excuse and a reason. You can find plenty excuses, but not one bloomin' reason for bein' careless."

(By MARCUS A. DOW.)

If there's any one kind of a hick answerin' to the name of drivin' fool it's the bird who waves alibi at you whenever he gets in dutch and has an accident.

A party of my more or less remote acquaintance parked his speed buggy at the curb and went into a house. While he was gone it rolled away and collided with a sedan. In the sedan was a lady about thirty years old. She was a good lookin' dame, fair complected, brown hair and a cheery smilin' sort of face that spread sunshine wherever she went. Her sedan got a nasty rap and a piece of jagged glass cut a deep ugly gash on her pretty cheek, disfigurin' her for life. I wonder how does that thoughtless lunatic that left his car parked in an unsafe manner feel about it down in his heart?

In his insurance report he wrote, "While I was in the house the brakes on my car let go, which was the cause of the accident." Don't his alibi give you a laugh? As if that tin can of his had some ghostly power enabling it to let go and start up of its own free will and ram another car. Now you know and I know his brakes didn't just let go. The fact is this guy parked on a grade, forgot to cut his wheels to the curb, and left his engine running! The vibration of the engine jarred the brakes loose and that old bus of his rolled down hill. A natural outcome of this guy's damfool carelessness.

I heard of a guy workin' on a railroad who turned in an accident report like this, "John Smith, brakeman, got bit on the end of the finger while trying to spit tobacco juice down a rattlesnake's throat." In answer to the question, "Who was to blame for the accident?" was written, "The rattlesnake."

Drivin' a bus or auto careless like is the same as teasin' a rattlesnake. Don't blame the snake if it bites you. And believe me, I know a lot of folks this kick in the shins is meant for.

Occasional Change of Oil Saves Efficiency

An engine, to operate efficiently, must have an occasional change of oil. If its lubricating value is diminished there is undue wear of all engine parts, which may lead to serious damage. Oil becomes practically worthless if an excessive amount of gasoline has become mixed with the lubricant, so as to make it very thin, or if water has gotten into it and caused it to emulsify or to contain free acid. Also, if dust, metal particles, pieces of carbon or other hard and abrasive material have polluted the oil in considerable quantities, its further use will cause very rapid wear of engine parts.

AUTOMOBILE HINTS

Valve cores in tires should be renewed about once each year.

A little light oil will relieve the stubborn manipulation of the choke button.

Over 58 per cent of the new cars bought last year were on the installment plan.

The fouling of spark plugs or excessive oil consumption will cause the engine to smoke.

A new car sometimes turns out to be a "lemon" simply because the owner has not given it the proper care.

Cars are getting lower and lower and maybe the time will come when pedestrians can jump over them.

• • •

A hit-and-run motor driver may be hard to catch. The penalty should be the more severe on that account.

THE MOTOR QUIZ

(How Many Can You Answer?)

Q. Why does an old car use more oil than a new one?

Ans. Primarily because different joints in old cars are looser, permitting the oil to leak out. Also pistons and rings which have been worn will pass oil into the combustion chamber where it is burned.

Q. If after parking one finds oil has leaked from the engine of his car, what should he do?

Ans. The car should be inspected and loose parts tightened in order to conserve oil. This will make a big difference in oil consumption.

Q. What is the most important oil saving device on the automobile?

Ans. The oil filter. It removes the foreign matter from the oil, thus making it possible to use the oil much longer. Every 10,000 miles the oil filter cartridge should be renewed as it becomes filled at this mileage.

Q. If the oil filter is not renewed when it becomes filled with foreign matter, what happens?

Ans. It will be necessary to change oil more frequently as the oil is not filtered.

The latest adaption of rockets has been their use in propelling cyclists. The picture shown above is one taken on a Berlin track in which the riders attained a high speed of 40 kilometers an hour. The exact results have been kept secret and will not be made public until the completion of the tests.

Pointers on Proper Care of Expensive Automobile

Engine and chassis lubrication, batteries, radiator and tires are the important things to consider for the efficient operation of a car. The engine, chassis and radiator should be attended to according to the particular needs of the car, but batteries should be watered at least once every two weeks, and tires gauged and checked at least once a week.

Water and oil are two of the worst enemies of tire fabric, and, for this reason small stone cuts in the casing should be kept filled with some good tire filler. Oil will ruin an inner tube in a week. Never throw the extra inner tubes in promiscuously with the greasy rags and oil can. Wrap them carefully in cloth, or, better still, get a couple of good, strong cloth bags for them.

Protecting Automobile Engine Against Wear

The thin oil film between moving parts is really what protects the automobile engine against wear. This oil film is six times thinner than the page of this newspaper. It is kept clean by the oil filter—the device through which the oil passes and is filtered.

After 10,000 miles of driving it is important to service the oil filter because after this mileage it becomes filled with as much as two pints of dirt, sludge and other foreign matter taken from the oil, and ceases to function at highest efficiency in keeping the oil film clean.

INAUGURATE FIRST MOTORBUS SLEEPER

The motor-bus traveler will now travel in a style equal to other transportation, with the inauguration of the new night-coach pullman and diner service. The new "Pullman of the Highways" will travel between St. Louis and Kansas City, and breakfast will be served en route at portable tables. The pullmans have two levels of chairs. These seats, 26 in all, are converted into 26 berths, the beds measuring 6 feet four inches long.

Striking Effects Produced by Combinations of Materials

While this brick and frame home has an appearance of the Dutch colonial, it will be noticed by the floor plan that it is slightly different. At the front are the living and dining rooms but the central hall is absent. This home contains five rooms and a sun parlor at the end.

By W. A. RADFORD

Mr. William A. Radford will answer questions and give advice FREE OF COST on all subjects pertaining to practical home building, for the readers of this paper. On account of his wide experience as editor, author and manufacturer, he is, without doubt, the highest authority on all these subjects. Address all inquiries to William A. Radford, No. 407 South Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill., and only inclose two-cent stamp for reply.

Some very fine effects are secured in the home building design illustrated by using combinations of different types of building materials. Brick and tile give the appearance of stability; lumber is perhaps the more flexible of the building materials that go into the construction of a house.

An example of what may be done when a combination of brick and lumber is used is shown in the home building design illustrated here. The walls of the home illustrated up to the second floor are of face brick which may be either solid brick construction or what is known as veneer brick construction. The latter means that instead of board siding one course of brick is used and tied to the frame of the house. In this house the use of brick is happy because the sun porch appears to be an integral part of the house rather than an addition, and the brick seems to be supporting pillars.

First Floor.

Second Floor.

While this home has the appearance of a Dutch colonial, it will be noticed by the floor plan that it is slightly different. At the front are the living and dining rooms, but the central hall, which marks the colonial design, is absent. The house contains five rooms and a large sun parlor with a balcony over the latter. Its dimensions are 26 feet, including the sun room, by 22 feet deep. How the rooms are arranged and the size of each are shown by the floor plan.

The use of shrubbery and flowers around the foundation of the house; the vines which are trained up the brick work of the house or sun porch; the flower boxes which edge the balcony, and the awnings give this house a very homey and pretty appearance.

Tile Roof Provides Protection From Fire

When the fire alarm awakes you at midnight on a windy night, do you calmy turn over and go to sleep again, or does the dread of fire, felt by all those who sleep in inflammable buildings, arouse you?

Even if the fire may be far away, you are not at ease, not knowing what progress the fire is making—whether victory awards the fire fighters or whether the burning brands borne by the wind are flying toward your roof.

The fear of fire is a dreadful thing. Fire, which is a good servant but a hard master, exacts its heavy toll year by year from those who fail to provide against its hazards. The annual loss in the United States is eight times as great as in England per thousand houses, it is said. Americans do not insist on fireproof materials for roofs and walls of homes like the English.

The roof is the most vulnerable point. Wood shingles are responsible for an unbelievable amount of fires. Often they are like tinder. Flying sparks from chimneys, from passing trains or nearby bonfires will often set an old, inflammable roof ablaze, and when such a fire is started it gets under headway quickly and is hard to stop.

The wind will lift firebrands of blazing shingles more than half a mile around. If they fall on a burnable roof, another fire is likely to be started.

Large conflagrations, such as the Chicago fire, the San Francisco fire and the Salem (Mass.) fire were spread in this manner.

A fire loss amounting to more than a million dollars annually is saved by many of the large cities in the United States that refuse to allow a combustible roof within their corporations.

Modern conditions and modern production methods have made it possible to have a permanent fireproof roof over a house of five or six rooms at about $250 more than the cost of perishable roofs. A home owner can, for an investment of an addition 2 or 3 per cent, secure a roof that is not only fire resisting but permanent as well as beautiful.

New Drain Plug for Tub Fits Old Chain Hole

Old lavatories and bathtubs with rubber plugs and chains may be modernized with a new type of metal drain control that fits any lavatory or bath. The water seal is made by a metal stopper which seats firmly into the body of the drain—there is nothing to wear or get out of working order. The units are made so that the heads may be obtained with nickel or chromium.

Floor Is Foundation of Rooms in the House

What color or design to select when purchasing a rug or carpet is a problem that bothers many people. However, if we remember that, just as the floor is the foundation of the room, the floor covering should keep that feeling in relation to the other furnishings, points out Harriet W. Allard in the Household Magazine, the problem will seem much less difficult.

This authority on homemaking advises a darker tone of color for rugs than for walls and ceilings, inasmuch as this carries out the idea of a foundation. However, she says, it is not necessary to confine one's choice to plain colors in somber shades, although carpets and rugs, in one color, or with a center of one color and border of another, have been, and still are, popular. They give an appearance of a firm, sturdy foundation.

Life and animation can be added to a room with a plain carpet by using colorful drapes and wall coverings. If the value of the color is comparatively darker than the side walls, there may be a deviation from a perfectly plain covering. Designs in keeping with those of other furnishings build character and add strength to a room. A one-color carpet is lifted successfully from the plain class by having a part of the pile cut to form a pattern. The effect of light, as it is reflected across the cut and uncut pile, gives a variation which is delightful. This is called the frieze weave.

The floor covering with a number of colors in the design may be the basis for the color scheme of the room. It can act in the same capacity that a picture, fabric hanging or a piece of pottery does when the colors in their decorations are repeated in the other furnishings. If the pattern is in harmonious and satisfying colors, it becomes a safe guide to follow in selecting wall coverings, draperies, furniture and bric-a-brac.

Floor Should Be of Seasoned Lumber Only

Cracks in a new well-laid floor are the result of a change in moisture content within the wood itself.

This change is due to improper preliminary seasoning; improper storage conditions at the mill or retail yard; delivery of the flooring during wet weather or before the masonry or plaster walls are dry; or it may be due to the absorption of moisture from the air within the building either before of after the flooring is laid.

The use of the heating plant may be advisable, says the United States forest service, to maintain a temperature that will prevent excessive humidity in the building from the time the flooring is delivered until the house is occupied.

Community Building

Importance of Proper House Design Apparent

Through a better appreciation of architecture, home lovers more and more are striving toward perfection and beauty of house design. As a result, a knowledge of historic styles is well defined in the minds of interested discriminating home builders. Today people know approximately what they want in the way of a home, and recognize the importance of architectural guidance. Only well-proportioned homes with artistic and correct architectural treatment attract and appeal.

To assure the ideal home—be its size ever so small—the technically trained architect should be consulted. No one thinks of going to a dentist with bodily ills. By the same token no one should go to a contractor for home design. Home design is a highly specialized field, and only an architect can reflect and crystallize your home ideas properly and correctly into a design possessing merit.

One often hears "because I'm building a small house, I can't afford an architect—besides, I know where I can get some plans cheap."

This attitude has accounted for hundreds of unattractive homes which have no resale value—eyesores and a disgrace to the community.—Cleveland Leader.

Store Front Counts as Good Business Asset

"The store front indicates the character of a business establishment as well as of the men back of it, and that holds good whether the business is clothing, shoes, plumbing or what not," Howard H. Edmonds writes in an article called "Store Fronts," in a recent issue of Domestic Engineering.

Edmonds draws upon his experience in building and remodeling store fronts for many Cleveland companies for the material in his article.

"The store front is a silent salesman which works 365 days in the year and if given half a chance will return its cost many times over in sales volume," he continued.

"A few of the great advantages of bringing a store front up-to-date are: It becomes a public improvement; it stimulates an activity in the entire community; it gradually builds up a healthy trading center in which to do business."

Attractive Homes an Asset

Two ideas about the American home have had a remarkable growth in recent years. One is that the dwelling of today, if it is to hold a fair position in competition with the motor car and other comparatively recent allurements from the outside, must display the attractiveness and good taste that characterize many of these other things. But it has become increasingly evident, too, that the task of bringing the home up to the desired artistic level is even more a matter of education, good taste and skillful guidance than it is a matter of money. The element of cost must be considered, of course, in any circumstances. But attractiveness of the best sort may be a feature of the moderately priced home as of the motor car of a similar nature.

Getting on Airman's Map

Communities that want the world to know they are air-minded—and most of them apparently have this desire—can make air-marking one of their first important objectives. Labeling the town, village, city or hamlet with its name painted in large and legible letters on the roof of the tallest building may seem rather a humble start in the direction of aviation. Far from it.

"It is the easiest way to get on the airman's map," says a pilot with hundreds of hours of cross-country flying to his credit.

The Fireless City

The fire prevention idea has developed into a major community enterprise in the city of Albany, Ga., and it now enjoys the distinction of being regarded as the "Fireless City." With a population of 20,000, it has the lowest annual loss by fire of any city in the country. There were but 91 alarms of fire during 1928 and the total loss was but $4,520. This has been accomplished by wiping out many fire hazards and by maintaining an energetic fire patrol nightly.

OLD DOCTOR'S IDEA IS BIG HELP TO ELDERLY PEOPLE

In 1885, old Dr. Caldwell made a discovery for which elderly people the world over praise him today!

Years of practice convinced him that many people were endangering their health by a careless choice of laxatives. So he began a search for a harmless prescription which would be thoroughly effective, yet would neither gripe nor form any habit. At last he found it.

Over and over he wrote it, when he found people bilious, headachy, out of sorts, weak or feverish; with coated tongue, bad breath, no appetite or energy. It relieved the most obstinate cases, and yet was gentle with women, children and elderly people.

Today the same famous, effective prescription, known as Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, is the world's most popular laxative. It may be obtained from any drugstore.

JEFFRIES & CULLER HARDWARE

EVERYTHING IN HARDWARE

THE JEFFRIES & CULLER HARDWARE, 105-107-109 E. High St., Hicksville, Phone 21, is one of the RELIABLE HARDWARE STORES of this section that carries an up-to-date stock of HARDWARE of QUALITY. An immense stock of goods is carried by this institution, as it keeps pace with the demands of its customers.

In the present day of hurry and rush the patron insists that his demands for a nail or screw be given the same careful attention as though he were buying a malleable range. Particular attention to just such details of the business have won great popularity for this store.

This firm has one of the largest stocks of Hardware in this section which comprises SHELF and HEAVY HARDWARE, STOVES, KITCHEN UTENSILS, FISHING TACKLE, AMMUNITION, ETC.

This store has maintained a reputation for HIGH GRADE Goods for many years and their standing in the community is behind everything they sell.

The management thoroughly understands the business and they favor everything for the betterment of Hicksville and the adjoining territory.

There is no firm in this section that is more deserving of the support of the citizens of this community than THE JEFFRIES & CULLER HARDWARE, at Hicksville, which has by its fair and accomodating business methods, done as much to advance the "Buying at Home Rule" as any firm in this section, by furnishing the Highest Grade Goods at Most Reasonable Prices.

We are pleased to place the JEFFRIES & CULLER HARDWARE among the leading business men as they have always been found to be progressive and enterprising, always having the interest of this community at heart.

L. WAITE WIDNEY

Sheet Metal, Plumbing and Heating

What the arteries are to the body, a plumbing system is to the home. This comparison is indeed not far-fetched. Both require careful and expert attention when they need repair. If your circulatory system is bad, you are doomed; if the plumbing system of a home is defective, you are never at peace.

L. WAITE WIDNEY, 418 S. Main St., Auburn, Phone 52, make it their business to put and keep the plumbing system of your house in order.

L. WAITE WIDNEY and his employes have gained that mastery of their trade which only comes with careful study and long experience. If you have plumbing troubles you need look no further to have them eliminated.

If you are building a home consult them. They will gladly advise you as to the very best that can be obtained in the way of a plumbing system for your home. If you wish they will take the contract to entirely install the plumbing system in your home. Their work is guaranteed and their prices the most reasonable possible consistant with the high quality of their services. Their excellent work and their never-failing service together with the high grade materials which they use have earned for them a reputation as sanitary engineers not exceeded in this section of the state.

If you visit L. WAITE WIDNEY'S stock and display rooms, you will see there the BEST that can be bought in the line of plumbing supplies. The fixtures are of the latest design and have the most modern scientific appliances to assure their convenience.

You will also find on display in this house the latest kitchen plumbing supplies. All these conveniences which take away the drudgery from kitchen work. Sinks which contain the latest convenient device to make such tasks as dish washing far less annoying.

You will find here, too, all the fixtures for the modern vapor heating system in the home. Scientists have long agreed that the most healthy kind of heat is that supplied by the vapor system—steam and hot water.

WIDNEY'S are experts. The proper installation of a steam or hot water furnace is the job of no apprentice. It requires the most careful knowledge of the principles of heat and long experience to furnish an acquaintance with the practical details which determine the successful operation of such a system. They are also prepared to do all kinds of SHEET METAL WORK.

Needless to say, the enviable reputation of this popular Sheet Metal and Plumbing Firm has been achieved only by doing business on a fair and honest basis.

THE BEST BOOSTER FOR YOUR BUSINESS IN DeKALB COUNTY

ST. JOE NEWS.

NEWS MAKES A GOOD PAPER, SO SEND IT IN TO US.

VOL. XLIV | ST. JOE, DeKALB COUNTY, INDIANA, THURSDAY, JUNE 19, 1930 | NUMBER 25

Large crowd at Concerts

Saturday evening concerts have proven very popular in the past seasons and St. Joe business men are again providing this feature for their friends and patrons.

These concerts are financed by St. Joe's loyal home town merchants who appreciate the patronage of their friends and provide these concerts each season.

St. Joe's band has been rehearsing for some time and when they made their initial appearance last Saturday evening they were greeted by an enthusiastic audience. If you enjoy these concerts and the musical numbers the band plays for you, give them a bit of applause. If you cannot voice your appreciation by clapping your hands, "honk" your automobile horn and the members of the band will know that you appreciate their selections. Such efforts put forth tend to induce the entertainers to give you their best to please you.

Bring your family every Saturday night and enjoy the concerts of the season by the Community Welfare Band.

The following program will be rendered next Saturday night:

1—The Big Parade.
2—Stein Song.
3—Old Rugged Cross, Vocal.
4—Invincible Fidelity.
5—Pilgrim's Triumphal.
6—Carolina Moon.
7—Stars and Stripes Forever.
8—Mignonnette.
9—National Emblem.
Taps.

GASOLINE REFUNDS IN MAY OVER $125,000

The amount of gasoline tax refunds in May 1930 was $125,489.59 as against $29,242.12 of the same month in 1929 or an increase of $96,247.47. The collections in May are for gasoline sold in April and this is the first month where a comparison can be made with the corresponding month of a year ago when a four cent tax was in force. The gain made in April of this year over last year amounts to 2,984,478 gallons. More than 40,000,000 gallons were consumed in Indiana this year in April and at twenty cents per gallon. Indiana motorists paid over $8,000,000 for this kind of fuel during the thirty days of that month.

There were 12,095 refunds made last month to consumers purchasing gasoline for purposes other than highway transportation and a majority of these refunds were made to farmers of the state.

FUNERAL ANNOUNCEMENT

Mrs. Minta Northrup, after two weeks illness, passed away Wednesday morning at the home of her daughter, Mrs. W. L. Hamilton, east of St. Joe.

The funeral arrangements are announced for Friday afternoon at 2 o'clock, standard time, from the Hamilton home. Rev. J. O Rose and J. N. Scholes, officiating, with burial in the Alton cemetery.

The body was in state at the Kinsey funeral home until 4 o'clock Wednesday, when it was removed to the home.

W. H. Northrup, the husband, and Mrs. Pluma Hamilton, daughter, survive.

SUMMER SCHOOLS AT WINONA

Winona Lake, Indiana, June 18, 1930.—Winona Lake, famed as a religious, educational and recreational center, boasts of more schools than any place of its size in the country. The list scheduled for operation this summer includes the following: Indiana University Biological School, June 14 to August 8; Extension Division of Indiana University, June 14 to August 22; Summer Art School, June 16 to July 26; Band and Orchestra School, June 23 to August 9; Summer High School, June 16 to August 22; Bible School of Theology, July 9 to August 14; School of Sacred Music, August 11 to 14; Summer School of Christian Education, June 16 to August 22; Women's School of Missions, June 19 to 26; National Photographers' School, June 23 to August 23; School of Jewish Missions, August 8 to 15.

These schools, some of them the only ones of their kind in the country, are all accredited schools. The total enrollment in all of the schools will be between 2,000 and 3,000.

In addition to these regularly classified schools there will be numerous conferences designed primarily to afford training and education. Included in this list is Bethany Camp, where thousands of girls are given religious training and afforded a delightful vacation period. Young Peoples' conferences of several denominations will be held throughout the summer for training of young boys and girls in Christian work.

The State Board of Health will have charge of Child Hygiene Week, July 7 to 11 and during that time children will be examined and parents will receive daily instruction in the proper care of babies and children. Dr. Ada E. Schweitzer, of the Child Hygiene Department of the Indiana State Board, will have personal charge.

NEW AND TESTED RECIPES FOR LADIES OF THE NEWS

ICED COFFEE

(By Betty Barclay)

Iced coffee was not the nectar of the gods of Olympus, for in those days there was no coffee and no ice, even for the gods. But things are different now, and the plain ordinary mortal may drink as much as he likes of a warm-weather beverage that probably would have evoked roars of joy from the ancient divinities of Greece.

Iced coffee won its initial popularity purely because of its delicious, refreshing taste, but since it was first introduced to thirsty Americans many other of its good points have come to light.

In the first place, it is easily made—an excellent thing to remember when you want a cooling beverage quickly. Secondly, it costs very little, which is something worth considering in view of the vast amounts of cold drinks that are consumed in this country every summer. And, thirdly, it is stimulating. In the summer most people eat much less than in winter, and they are apt, for that reason not to get enough of those foods that produce and sustain the necessary energy. The stimulating qualities of coffee help to straighten out such deficiencies in the summer diet and, in addition, coffee has a tonic effect on the nerves, which sometimes show a tendency to get frayed out in hot weather.

LANDS JOB OF REPAIRING PLATFORM

Our old friend, Wm. Lucas, who bears the distinction of being our local humorist, again breaks loose and sends The News his latest from Fort Wayne. Here it is:

Fort Wayne, Ind.
June 14, 1930.

Dear Mr. Editor:

How are you? I am still alive and glad you are not dead. Well work is very slack now but we, Miller and Mr. Horn and Bill have plenty of work.

We have built one auto house and now are ready to start on the democrat platform as they want a new plank in it, so they sent a man over to Hickory, Pa., to get one, but Henry Ford had got it all for Ford rims so they sent a man to the north pole, you see it fell down, when the sun crossed the line and they cannot get back on it, its so slick, and as soon as Greeley can saw we will fix the platform as they want a wet plank in it this fall and it will be a slick one, ha, ha.

But we have a lot of work making handles for the Toledo Blade. I am thinking of going to Urip, Irp, Sirp, and go through Turkey Thanksgiving and get work in an auto shop and come home Christmas all over Greece.

Good bye, as ever,
Bill.

AUTO FATALITIES IN INDIANA

A total of 526 people were killed and 3,753 people were injured in automobile accidents during the months of March, April and May, as shown in a recapitulation of the records in the Automobile License Department of the Secretary of State. The report has just been tabulated and given to Otto G. Fifield, Secretary of State, and an analysis of the same reveals some interesting information.

Of the total number of persons killed during the past 3 months 41 were children under 4 years of age; 75 were between the ages of 5 and 14, making a total of 116 children under 15 years of age, a total of 347 between the ages of 15 and 64, with 63 over the age of 65.

Mr. Fifield stated that all of these accidents and deaths are from records outside of Marion County. A division of the fatalities shows that 95 pedestrians lost their lives during he month of May and that 66 were killed in collisions and 15 in hitting fixed objects, and 39 were killed when cars skidded, ran into ditches and turned over.

The total for the three months is as follows: 198 pedestrians killed; 143 deaths from auto collisions, and 142 deaths from skidding, turning over, hitting bridge abutments, trees and culverts.

A further analysis of the figures compiled by the Secretary of State shows that 1,298 persons were injured in automobile accidents during the month of May. Of this amount 53 were children under four years of age; 158 between the ages of 5 and 14, making a total of 211 children under the age of fifteen.

During the month of April 1,165 persons were injured and 650 persons in March. The tabulation reveals that during the month of May a 100% increase was made in persons injured over the month of March.

The figures also show that during the three months period 490 children under the age of 15 were injured; 2,445 persons between ages of 15 and 64, and 78 persons over 65 years of age. Of this number 427 injured were pedestrians, while 1,026 resulted from collisions between two or more automobiles, and 887 injured when cars skidded, turned over or ran into ditches, making a total of 3,753 persons injured in all types of automobile accidents during the past three months.

Mr. Fifield stated that the State Police Force is making every endeavor to regulate the traffic upon the State highways, but due to the small number of men it is impossible to cover the state roads as completely as he would like and he further stated tha it will ake the cooperation of the driving public to accomplish results and appeals to the public generally to aid in the movement. He pointed out that in 13 states which have a Drivers' License Law, statistics show that when this law is enforced a reduction of 25% in automobile accidents is accomplished.

Mr. Fifield said, "Indiana has a Drivers' License Law, which has been in effect less than one year. It is a new law and enforcement officers in the State are not familiar with all its provisions. The cooperation of all citizens in the State is asked in the enforcement of this law and any cases which citizens will be kind enough to report will be promptly investigated to the end and that reckless driving may be curbed making the roads and streets safe for pedestrians as well as careful automobile drivers."

Mr. Fifield is now having representatives of the department call upon the judges and enforcement officers who are connected with traffic violations in order that they may become more familiar with the law.

HICKSVILLE EMPLOYS NEW TEACHER–COACH

Poland Today

A Village Street in Rural Poland.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

POLAND'S importance among the nations of Europe has been recognized by the United States by the raising of the United States legation at Warsaw to the status of an embassy. There has been a marked friendliness since the World war between the great republic of the Western hemisphere and the new republic of Central Europe, and a loan of many millions has gone from the former to help place the latter on a strong financial foundation.

American business methods have captured the imagination and admiration of the Poles, and scarcely a work on scientific management is published in America today that is not translated into Polish. Poland has industries that were begun before the discovery of America, but some of them are being rejuvenated by American methods under the guidance of American engineers.

Oldest of Poland's industries to be affected by new methods are her salt mines which were adding to the savor of Central European foods as early as the Tenth century. The first iron forge began operations in 1333 and may be looked upon as the beginning of the iron founding industry which now contributes millions of dollars worth of values each year to Polish manufacture. An important lumber industry, based on timber lands covering 52,000 acres, was begun in the Eighteenth century. A tree must be ninety years old before it is cut. The entire forest area of the country is more than 22,000,000 acres.

One of Poland's most interesting industries is a plant for building railway equipment that was started in Napoleonic times as a wagon factory. The textile industry keeps more than 3,000,000 spindles busy, and there are numerous factories for the manufacture of paper, chemicals, and metal articles.

Only Germany, which is Poland's nearest western neighbor, exports more goods to the country than does the United States. In a recent year the United States furnished approximately 16 per cent of all Polish imports.

Old Poland Resurrected.

The Poland of today is not an entirely new entity. She is rather a resurrection of the old Poland which once was one of the greatest nations of Christendom. In size she outranked nearly every nation of the continent. Russia alone of the European nations is larger than Poland was at her greatest. In population she stood at the forefront of Europe: only Russia and Germany had greater populations before the war than are to be found in the lands that once were Poland; for unpartitioned Poland had an area of 282,000 square miles, and the lands that once lay within her boundaries support a population of approximately 50,000,000. In area she was as large as the former German empire, Switzerland, Belgium, Holland and Denmark together; larger than Great Britain, Italy and Greece combined; larger than Austria-Hungary and Servia in one. Within what were her boundaries there dwells a present population larger than the combined populations of Great Britain and Belgium; larger than those of France, Belgium and Holland together; and matching that of the old Austria-Hungary.

Poland was three times partitioned, and these partitionings were readjusted between the partitioners by the congress of Vienna in 1815. Where the original partitions had given Russia 181,000 square miles, Prussia 54,000 square miles, and Austria 45,000 square miles, the reapportionment of the Vienna congress gave Russia 220,500, Prussia 26,000, and Austria 35,000 square miles. Much of the land which Prussia secured, and particularly Kiev, had been identified with Russia generations before.

Poland, in the days of her greatest area, extended from a point within 50 miles of Berlin, on the west, to the meridian of the sea of Azov on the east; on the north it reached nearly to the Gulf of Finland and on the south down to the Khanate of Crimea.

Former Russian Poland.

What was known before the World war as Russian Poland is that neck of territory stretching westward between the Prussias and Galicia. This territory has an area almost exactly equal to that of New York state, yet, in spite of the fact that its extreme southern boundary lies north of the latitude of Winnipeg, its population is as great as those of New York and New Jersey combined.

Former Russian Poland, in this limited sense, consists of a great plain, somewhat undulating, with an average elevation of about 400 feet, sloping upward toward the highlands of Galicia on the south and toward the swelling ground paralleling the Baltic on the north. It joins the lowlands of western Germany with the great plain of western Russia. Its rivers are slow and sluggish, with their mouths often but a few dozen feet below their sources and seldom more than a few hundred feet below. Their basins intricately interpenetrate one another, and the frequept inundations of these basins have covered them with a very rich alluvial soil.

Russian Poland usually has a winter somewhat similar to that of New England. There is an even cold, with not a great deal of snow, but often with razoredged winds from the northward. The rivers of this region usually freeze over about the middle of December, and the Vistula is under ice for approximately 80 days during the average winter.

In the Eighteenth century, when the city of Warsaw, next to Paris, was the most brilliant city in Europe, this flat plain was unusually rich in herds and geese flocks, though almost bare of manufactures.

Poland's history has been a tragic one through the ages. Next to the Russians, they are numerically the most important of the Slavs. They first appeared in Great, or North, and Little, or South, Poland in the Tenth century, where they found other Slavic tribes in possession. The wise policy of their kings early induced the whole nation to profess Christianity.

People Have Changed Little.

Of medium size, with round heads and healthful faces, the blond more common than the brunet, their physical appearance has apparently changed little. The working classes, who constitute nine-tenths of the nation, have always been laborious, frugal, enduring, temperate rather than abstemious, and intensely patriotic. Their szlacta, or nobles, have shown themselves impetuous, brave to rashness, chivalrous, insubordinate, emotional, artistic.

During the formative period Poland was consolidated by the dynasty of the great Lithuanian, Jagellon, the Polish Wadislaus II—a succession of princes unsurpassed in constructive ability. Union with the Lithuanians doubled the population and the national resources. Together they crushed the Teutonic knights at Tannenberg in 1410 and half a century later at the peace of Thorn pushed them east of the Vistula. The Polish lands on the Baltic, together with Danzig and Marienberg, were recovered. The Duchy of Mazovia, of which Warsaw was the center, five centuries independent, voluntarily joined the kingdom which a few years later spanned Europe from the Baltic to the Black sea. The Reformation, regarded with a suspicion as having a German origin, only for a time disturbed the country.

The advantageous situation of the kingdom, the admirable qualities of its common people, and the development already attained, seemed to assure the greatness and permanence of the Polish state. Yet in Poland's history there is disappointment on every page. The brilliant passages are episodes without connection or result. Nowhere else is so much valor wasted. The chasm was always widening between the nobles and the common people. The people paid all the taxes. The nobles, all equal, possessed all the wealth and power, but had no sense of obligation or responsibility. Intrepid in battle, they were ready to fight for the country only when so inclined.

Downfall and Partition.

The system of government was oligarchic in the extreme. Succession to the powerless throne was elective, native or foreigner alike eligible. Each election was an orgy of turbulence and bribery. Twice the throne was put up at auction. The liberum veto, established in 1652, whereby the negative vote of a single member of the diet nullified any act or all the acts of all the rest, culminated in anarchy and eventually brought about the destruction of Poland.

Yet the criminal follies of a privileged class in no way excuse or palliate the iniquity of the three partitions of Poland in 1773, 1793 and 1795 by Prussia, Russia and Austria.

Poland has enriched the world in music, art, and literature. The national dances, the polonaise and the masurka, were always accompanied by singing. Copernicus is Poland's greatest name. Sienkiewicz, victim of the World war, by many considered the most brilliant writer of the day, was a Pole, as is Paderewski.

The SANDMAN STORY

ABOUT THE PARTY

MRS. CUCUMBER GREEN, whose real name was Margaret, but whose pretend name was Mrs. Cucumber Green, as probably you all know, had had a party.

Allie Baa, her favorite rag doll, had helped with the party. It had been a huge success.

The other children had come and had brought their dolls.

Every one had had such a good time.

The dolls had behaved so well.

Every mother had been so proud of her children, as they had every right to be.

After the party was over and Mrs. Cucumber Green's children had been covered up with the blanket in the little express cart Allie cuddled up in her mother's arms in the bed by Number Four Green Lane.

"Every Mother Had Been So Proud of Her Children."

Back of the bed, or rather at the side of the bed toward the wall, was a quite wide space.

This was called, by Mrs. Cucumber Green, Number Four Green Lane.

This was the make-believe street in which she lived. When she walked along this space, up to the end where the back wall was, she pretended she was at the market.

Then she would talk to make-believe shopkeepers and buy all sorts of make-believe things for housekeeping.

The wall paper was a very gay one and there were figures on the wall paper she pretended were people who were her neighbors.

The street was called after the Green family who had always lived there. All the make-believe Greens, Mrs. Cucumber said, had always lived in the same place.

Here Mrs. Cucumber Green kept her toys. Number Four Green Lane was a very busy section, I can tell you.

Now that the party was all over it had been such a success and it would be something they could talk about with pride and joy and happy remembrances for some time.

Of course Mrs. Cucumber Green would give other parties, as she had always given a good many parties and was fond of entertaining.

Allie was fond of entertaining, too.

She enjoyed speaking to all the guests. Mrs. Cucumber Green changed her voice to speak for Allie. That made it easy.

In a squeaky little voice Mrs. Cucumber Green would say:

"Yes, I'm Allie. Of course I remember you. And you remember me, too?

"Yes, they all say I've grown, though I can't see it myself.

"Do take your hat and coat off, won't you? You won't feel the good of them when you go out if you don't.

"Ah, yes, that's better. Now you'll be more comfortable and you won't catch cold when you go out."

Allie was a good talker as you can see.

But now they were in bed and soon they would be asleep.

How Allie did cuddle up in her mother's arms. Her mother held her very close.

"Oh, my darling, darling, darling Allie Baa," she said. "You looked so sweet today with all your clean, clean clothes. How nice it was to have all clean clothes, even your stockings and worsted slippers were clean for the occasion.

"You look so wonderful, wonderful, my darling Allie Baa."

Allie Baa snuggled even a little closer. It was so nice to hear her mother's sweet words of praise.

"Oh, muvvie dear," Allie said, in her dear little squeaky voice, "what a lovely day we had."

And Mrs. Cucumber Green answered:

"I'm so glad, my darling, and we shall have more lovely days."

Then Mrs. Cucumber Green's eyes slowly closed and for a little while Allie was wide awake.

She turned ever so slightly in her mother's arms—not enough so as to disturb her—just a very little bit.

Then she looked at her mother whose eyes were closed, sleeping so beautifully.

"What a lucky rag doll I am," she said to herself, "to have such a good, good mother."

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

"BELOW THE SALT"

HERE is a phrase which is not heard so frequently nowadays, but which is full of the color of a bygone age.

In medieval times a large salt cellar would be placed in the center of the dining table.

At state dinners, where a large number of guests of varying degrees of nobility would be invited, it was customary to seat those of the higher classes at the upper end of the table—that is, above the salt; while those of lesser nobility were seated at the nether end of the table, or below the salt.

It is from this circumstance that the expression, "Below the salt," came into common use with its quite logical connotations of inferiority and meniality.

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

STORMS AND DEATH

IT IS a worldwide and very ancient superstition that if anyone is dangerously ill—so dangerously that life and death hang in the balance—if a storm arises the sick person will die during the storm's continuance. One instinctively thinks of the death of Napoleon amid the great storm which shook the crags of St. Helena or of other historic instances of fiery spirits passing amid the warring of the elements. Primitive man saw in all natural phenomena something related to his own spiritual being. Groping in a world of mysteries, himself not the least mysterious of things, he linked his destiny to stars and storms, to moon and sun and growing trees and plants. For him there were no boundaries between the visible and the invisible worlds. And seeking in all things for a cause it was most natural that, in the sweeping of the midnight blasts, he should hear Odin hunting with his train and in the howling of the tempest evil spirits waging destruction, or disembodied souls calling to souls still in the flesh. Among many savage peoples today a storm is still thought to be caused by some malign spiritual being and they seek to exorcise the "storm-fiend" by various rites and incantations. Among other peoples living in a primitive state it is the spirits of the dead which manifest themselves in a storm. Both these conceptions were common to our primitive ancestors and it can be readily seen how, in the course of the ages, they should have consolidated and shaped themselves into the superstition that a soul wavering in its earthly tenement should be swept away on the wings of a tempest.

Old Military Organization

The Ancient and Honorable Artillery company of Boston had for its first commander Capt. Robert Keayne. The organization was formed on March 13, 1638 or 1639, under its first name of Military Company of the Massachusetts. Captain Keayne was formerly of the London company of the same title. The Boston company claims to be an off-shoot of the older one. The necessity of a watch and military training in Massachusetts was coincident with the settlement of the town.

Maurice Chevalier

This is handsome Maurice Chevalier as he appears in a scene from the production, "Paramount on Parade," intimate frolic of screen stars. The idol of France introduces the song, "Sweeping the Clouds Away," in the picture. "The Big Pond" is Chevalier's latest all-talking starring vehicle. The production is filmed in both English and French dialogue.

GANDHI

IT IS impossible to ignore the appeal of Mahatma Gandhi. Physically he has been described as a dwarf, with "emaciated, crooked limbs, lower legs that fold up like the legs of a folding chair; elbows sharp as pointed sticks, a hairy breast with protruding ribs, a mouth which has left only three or four doubtfully secure teeth covered by long, sensitive lips, a long tongue which almost gestures when he speaks, huge ears, high cheek bones, dark, deep eyes and a furrowed brow which moves eloquently over his peaked forehead."

L. A. Barrett.

This man alone and single-handed has impressed his personality and his principles upon the attention of the world as has no other person since the days of the early Roman empire. Not only has India come under his influence, but it is frankly admitted that he is destined to influence by his teachings the entire western civilization. Some have claimed that he holds the secret of the ultimate peace of the world.

What is the secret of this power which has stirred the world and even brought embarrassment to the British government? How can we explain the devotion and even worship that the entire peasant population in India have for him? Surely there must be some explanation of the reform movements in India which are solving the problem of child marriage, opium traffic, liquor evil and many other wrongs which have retarded the development of that great country.

The secret of Gandhi's power seems to be in his preaching and actually living the principles of self-renunciation and non-resistance. He is more than a mere theorist. Many reformers have given to the world important ideas but seldom do we find a reformer giving his own personal life as a sacrifice to those ideas. Gandhi actually lives his principles. His own life actually reflects the power of those principles. Whether all persons agree with him or not, he is given credit for being desperately in earnest and transparently sincere.

Gandhi is seeking to demonstrate that the principle of non-resistance is the most potent factor not only in solving international problems, but in determining the peace of the world.

Community Building

Why Living in Small Town Has Advantages

Prof. Walter B. Pitkin bases a prophecy as to the rosy future of the small town, which he makes in the Household Magazine on four things: The healthier living conditions in small towns, the realization that the majority of city dwellers are as poor as their country brethren, the new shift of industry away from big cities, and the better opportunities for occupying one's leisure in the country.

Small towns, he says, have sunshine, quiet and freedom from smoke. Out of every thousand inhabitants of the big towns, you cannot find more than three or four who are better off in their jobs than the people you meet in Main street or around by the post office. And now comes the new American revolution! Industry begins shifting to the small towns. No man in his senses thinks of starting a factory in a metropolis nowadays unless he is making something which cannot be made elsewhere. And, finally, concludes Doctor Pitkin, "If you live far from the clamor of Broadway, you can pick and choose your leisure pursuits effectively. And, having picked them, you can hold to your course with fewer distractions. And that, I maintain, is half of happiness. To do what you like, in the way of exercise, play, rest, reading, music, inventing, dreaming, or what not, without having a mob of peddlers yelling at you to do something else."

Development of City Depends on Planning

It was only ten or fifteen years ago that planning, and along with it zoning, came to be regarded as absolutely necessary in the larger cities of this country. It was soon evident that only by such means could haphazard growth be replaced by orderly development in the interest of rapidly increasing numbers of urban residents. The desirability of the same protection for suburban areas and smaller centers is a product of more recent years. The spread of this enterprise is an indication of the improved conditions which are a part of the modern city.

In giving the result of a recent survey of the situation, the Department of Commerce, through its division of building and housing, notes this fact:

"Cities having planning commissions are believed to be more apt than others to exercise foresight and true economy in the laying out and improvement of streets, the location of parks, playgrounds and public works, the development of transit and transportation, provision for street traffic and in the equitable regulation of private use of land through zoning ordinances."

Good Citizen Defined

Good citizenship is loyalty toward community, state and country. It begins right at home. A citizen who delights in keeping his own premises cleaned up and developed, who cooperates with each worthy cause or development that promises improvement, advancement, or uplifting of his community; who supports his home institutions and enterprises so far as economics permit; who obeys the law, who loves order and peace; who takes pride in helping to develop and maintain these conditions, with a similar spirit and attitude prevailing for state and country, is an example of what constitutes good citizenship.—Ruth Adele Barr, in Grit.

Must Speed Up Planting

During recent years tree planting has received great stimulus in the states largely because of the help that the federal government has been able to give. In 1925 only 13 states were distributing planting stock to its citizens, says the American Tree association. Thirty-two states are now engaged in this activity. Nevertheless, it is going to be necessary to speed up America's planting program at least ten times in order to reforest our denuded lands with reasonable promptness.

Makes for Civic Good

Just as the improvement in the home influences the family, the modernization of a house does a certain amount of good for the community.

In the last analysis, a city is but a collection of homes and anything that improves a part is working for the good of the whole.

Modernizing lifts up a city out of its ordinary commonplace position and transforms it into a live progressive community, filled with busy individuals striving for their betterment.

Be Liberal With Paint

Paint has many virtues. Besides beautifying your home, it will increase its sale value and, in fact, the valuation and desirability of the entire neighborhood.

Particularly applicable in this connection is the oft-quoted but very true Dutch proverb: "Good paint costs nothing for it saves more than its cost."

CUPID PLAYS SOME CLEVER TRICKS

(© by D. J. Walsh.)

BETH MORAN loved her job better than anything else in the whole wide world. Maybe that sounds selfish but Beth had studied, toiled, sacrificed to get that job and she meant to keep it as long as she could. Not many young women of Beth's age were earning $70 per week. She had a tiny apartment which her Aunt Mary kept spic and span. No man living could ever be to her what her job was.

One afternoon when Beth came home from work she found a package on the living room table. Aunt Mary said a messenger had delivered it. She removed the wrapping paper and found a plain white box. Within the plain white box was an elaborate box bearing the name of an expensive brand of confections. A card lay on top. Upon the card was scribbled these words: "Every time you eat one of these think of me." No name.

"Who sent all that candy?" demanded Aunt Mary, looking over Beth's slim shoulder.

"Haven't an idea. Help yourself, auntie. There's plenty—three pounds."

Next morning Beth glanced from her desk to the desks of her fellow workers. Some were married, one at least engaged. Of the five remaining men it couldn't be Mr. Lowe. Or Edson Moffat. Or John Hess. It might be Jerome Warren. It might be Amos Wells. She hoped it was neither Warren nor Wells. Conjecture got her nowhere.

That afternoon she found another gift on the living room table. A florist's box. It contained pink roses. And this nameless message: "When you look at these think of me."

"Somebody's after you," remarked Aunt Mary.

"I wish you wouldn't say that!" flared Beth. "I think the man's a nut. Or else he's ashamed to let me know who he is." But she couldn't take her eyes from the lovely roses. "No man's going to make me give up my job for the sake of having Mrs. on my tombstone."

"Of course," mused Aunt Mary, "times have changed since my day. But I still believe it's a lot better for a girl to marry and raise a family than to be tied down to an office desk till her youth and beauty are past. I was seventeen when I married Tim. We lived together for forty years. Our children are all grown up and married. I'm free to look after you. But, my dear, I can't stay forever. I didn't come here with that understanding."

Beth bit her lip.

"You don't seem to realize, Aunt Mary, that I am modern to the core. A business woman first, last and always. Aunt Mary, I've fought and all but starved to get my present position. My job has cost me too much for me to give it up for—for that precious little thing called love," she ended mockingly.

The third day Beth received from her nameless pursuer a beautiful framed colored photograph of a beauty spot in the Pocono hills. "Wish you were here with me," was the message.

The fourth day. A lovely, quaint bit of jewelry.

"I picked up this amethyst for you," accompanied the gift.

The fifth day. A book of poems bound in hand-tooled leather. "Read the lines I have marked," she was bidden. Each line contained a direct appeal to her heart. She shut the book, her cheeks flaming.

It was maddeningly mysterious. She felt baffled. Next night she raced upstairs. Her heart throbbed wildly as she opened the living room door. Expectantly, eagerly her eyes sought the living room table. A large gift this time. A basket of fruit. The seventh day she received another box of candy.

Expectancy had become such a habit with her that on the eighth day when she found nothing she nearly suffered a collapse. When she looked in her mirror she found that she was pale. Her chin wanted to quiver. "Fool!" she muttered.

A week passed. A feeling of disappointment, of depression weighed upon Beth.

She lagged upstairs one afternoon. Nothing to look forward to any more. On the table was a box. Beth pounced upon it. Her hands trembled, her eyes were dim as she lifted the cover and saw the red roses.

Next day three men were absent from their desks. Vacation had begun. Late that afternoon a telegram was laid before Beth. It was from him. It came from a distant point. Thereafter she received a telegram each day for ten days. Each message was distinctive. But they gave no clew to the sender. Beth kept them all in a neat bundle.

Aunt Mary was lying down the following Sunday afternoon. Beth sat reading. The telephone rang. She leaped to it. A man's voice, deep, pleasant, came to her ears.

"Beth! I just got back. Get my wires?"

"Yes!" The word was propelled from her lips by her intense surprise.

"I'm coming to take you for a ride. In about twenty minutes. Can you go?"

Again faintly, "Yes!"

She hooked up the receiver and sank back on the davenport. Who was he? She hadn't recognized his voice. What was she letting herself in for?

Twenty minutes passed. He was at the door. She hesitated to open it. A tall man smiled down at her with clear blue eyes. An exceedingly good looking, virile young man. Mac Halway, advertising manager of her own firm.

"Well, Beth, here I am. Ready to explain everything."

Beth stiffened. Her lips set in a hard line.

"You seem to have been having a very good time at my expense," she said coolly. "But—I don't go riding with married men!"

"Beth! I'm not married. Where'd you get that idea? I've never even wanted to get married till I found you. You treated me rough. Three separate times you refused to have lunch with me. Doggone it, Beth! You had me feazed till I thought of a new way to approach you."

"I see. You advertised. You created interest, illusion, suspense in your prospect." Beth's eyes were beginning to relent.

"That's it exactly. But don't be hard on me, Beth. I bought a ring while I was away. I can't take it back. Can I, huh?" His blue eyes pleaded.

A flush, a smile, made Beth bewitching. Her firm, fixed notions of economic independence floated away like thistledown upon her sigh.

"Who wants you to?" she murmured.

Thumbs Left Out When Ancient Man "Counted?"

The words for nine in many modern European languages are believed by H. Campbell, an antiquarian of the Mediterranean island of Cyprus, to indicate that the ancestors of European races must have been accustomed to count on the eight fingers of their two hands, excluding the thumb, instead of counting by tens or all the digits of both hands taken together, as the majority of anthropologists have assumed and as is the basis of the present decimal system.

Mr. Campbell's argument, suggested in a recent issue of the London publication, Notes and Querries, rests on the similarity of words in the various languages for "nine" and "new," suggesting, he believes, that a count of nine once began a new count of the eight fingers already counted just as the word "twenty" in English resembles "twice," and indicates that the ordinary decimal count of ten is to be duplicated.

In Latin, Mr. Campbell points out, "novem" means nine, while the closely similar word "novum" means new. In Greek the two words of the same meanings are "ennea" and "nea," respectively. In German they are "neun," "neu"; in Gaelic they are "noadh" and "ndah," and so on. The English word "nine" comes from the German, Mr. Campbell declares, while "new" is from the Scandinavian, yet both words are much alike.

It seems possible, he believes, that traces of the root word used for "two" in the various languages are to be found also in the equivalents of "ten," indicating that two fingers were to be counted after one full count of eight was over.—New York World.

Paper Stage Scenery

One of the difficulties in the way of producing elaborate theatrical pieces at popular prices is the high cost of scenery for the stage. A theater in Geneva, Switzerland, is trying to solve this difficulty by using scenery composed of paper instead of the more expensive materials generally employed for that purpose. By using this method of making scenery a musical revue was recently produced for less than $100. The paper scenery is made practically fireproof by putting it through a chemical process. Those who invented the new type of scenery say that the bright colors of paper, together with its possible transparency, make that material very desirable for use in theaters, especially the more elaborate productions. — Pathfinder Magazine.

Merry-Go-Round Mansion

A house just completed by two Parisian architects enables the owner to have sunshine on any part of the house he wishes, merely by pressing a button. Built on the same principle as a locomotive turntable, the house is hexagonal in shape, with a terrace running the whole way round and a pergola garden on the roof. Power for rotating it is provided by a small electric motor controlled by duplicate buttons in every room, including one under the dining room table.

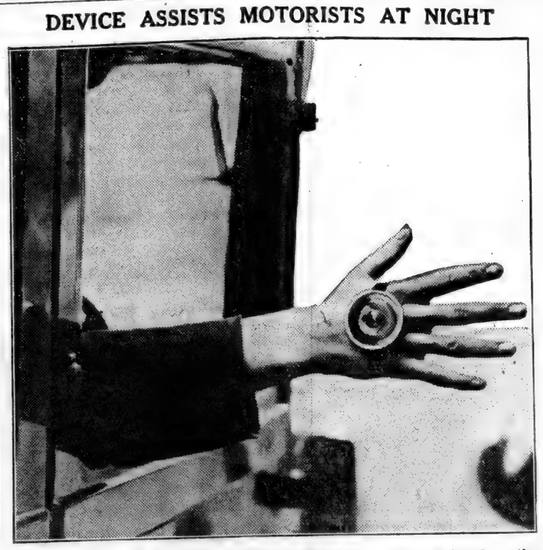
Eight steel girders, arranged in the shape of a fan, form the platform of the villa, which revolves on a central pivot, while the girdles have rollers at their extremities which run on a steel track.

So Different

Herbert Corey claims that men and women who sell fiction and poetry now look like prosperous business folk. Once upon a time the authoress might be identified by a strained look in her eye and a wisp of hair back of the right ear. Now she is bobbed, short-skirted, rouged and lip-sticked. Robert Edeson's quip about a writing star and his slightly less stellar wife would not pass now. He saw the pair lurking in a corner at a reception:

"They look," said he, "as though they had moved all the coal out of the bath-tub—and then didn't do it, after all."

DEVICE ASSISTS MOTORISTS AT NIGHT



A new device to assist motorists at night has just been placed on the London market. It is a reflector fixed to an elastic band which may be worn on the hand, enabling a driver to indicate his movements to any car following behind, as the brilliant red glow can easily be seen.

BILL, THE BUS DRIVER SAYS

"A minute's wait ain't expensive. It's the life, the pain and the dough you sometimes pay for bein' in a hurry that's costly."

(By MARCUS A. DOW.)

I said this was goin' to be a fair and impartial bawlin' out and for that reason I am goin' to bruise the shins of a million or two yaps.

A dame come to a crossin' on a busy street in a thrivin' town in the Middle West. They had a cop on that corner. They also had traffic lights which turned from green to red just as the dame got there. She was leadin' a little boy by the hand. It was her kid, about four years old, and he kept lookin' up into his mother's face, trustin' like. Did that dame wait for the traffic light to change or for the cop's whistle? She did not. She stood 'a fleetin' second or two leanin' over the edge of the curb like a horse champin' at the bit. She was one of them restless yaps rarin' to go.

Then she went. Dashed into the street draggin' that poor kid with her. A truck was comin' and she thought she could beat it but a drivin' fool in a tourin' car was passin' that truck on the left while goin' over the crossin' and she couldn't see it from the curb. She saw it when she was in front of the truck, got petrified with fear and stood stock still in her tracks until the truck hit her and knocked her under the wheels of the tourin' car. She got off with a busted leg and couple of ribs stove in. But it was the finish for the poor little kid with the trustin' eyes and childish confidence. Even the hard boiled cop turned his head away. The truck driver, a tough lookin' egg, stopped his death wagon and got out, shakin' like a leaf.

On the pavement back of the hind wheels lay a crushed little bundle in a white sailor suit, curly yellow hair matted down with streaks of red and little face smudged with oil and dirt.

Does the kick hurt a little? If it does write this in your book of good resolutions and stick to it:

"When crossin' streets I will not try to beat traffic, I will obey all traffic rules same as automobiles are supposed to do because I don't want to get bumped off yet."

THE MOTOR QUIZ

(How Many Can You Answer?)

Q. How much did motorists in United States pay for gasoline and oil in 1929?

Ans. More than $3,000,000,000, it is estimated. Over 38,000,000 gallons of gasoline were purchased daily.

Q. How many motor cars pass out of existence every year in the United States?

Ans. An average of 2,000,000.

Q. What will remove spots of tar from the motor car finish?

Ans. Tar sometimes spatters from newly patched asphalt roads. Butter spread over the spots of tar will make it easily removable. If there is no butter handy there are a number of preparations that do the job excellently.

Q. If adjustments of spark plug gaps vary will it have any effect on the car's performance?

Ans. Yes. It may cause uneven engine performance. This is why spark plug gaps should be inspected at least twice a year.

way to overcome this trouble. A light spring is attached at one end to the head of the jack and at the other end to the toe.—Popular Science Monthly.

Road Markers Protected by Law in Many States

Eighteen states now have laws making it a misdemeanor to willfully damage official road signs and with traffic steadily increasing there is a tendency to impose severe punishment on those who interefere with these utilities of travel, according to the research department of the American Automobile association.

The national motoring body pointed out that official road signs include all those erected by the state or local governments or by A. A. A. motor clubs with approval of the interested authorities.

The A. A. A. appeals to affiliated clubs, in states where such protective legislation has not been enacted, to conduct a vigorous campaign.

States in which it is now a misdemeanor to willfully damage, destroy, mutilate, tear down or deface any official road sign, warning or directional marker on highways are: Alabama, Arkansas, California, Delaware, Idaho, Louisiana, Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Pennsylvania, South Dakota and Virginia.

Will Weigh Trucks

Determined to enforce the law that denies overloaded trucks the use of certain highways, the Michigan highway department will install pit scales along principal trunk roads. State police will halt and weigh trucks suspected of carrying loads in excess of what the pavement will stand. The driver of an overloaded truck will be compelled to unload part of his cargo on the spot. He also may get a ticket.

Idea of Profit-Sharing Put on Business Basis

Bruce Grey, the noted political economist of San Francisco, said in an argument about the recognition of Russia:

"Lenin and his gang promised the proletariat a new heaven and a new earth. What they have given the proletariat is a new hell.

"It reminds me of the manufacturer who called in the foremen of his factory and said:

"'Boys, I want to keep up with the philanthropic movements of the day, so accordingly I'm going to establish a profit-sharing system here. I now put all hands from the first of the year on a profit-sharing basis.'

"The foremen beamed. One of them said:

"'What are our profits so far, boss?'

"'No profits, George,' said the manufacturer in a pleasant voice. 'No profits, but a loss of $30,000. The men's share is a 15 per cent wage reduction: Tell 'em to expect it in their envelopes next pay-day.'"

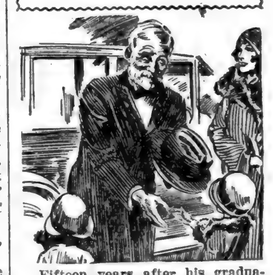
English Beadle Passing But Tribe Not Extinct

The passing of beadles is being lamented in England. One of the last existing specimens, the beadle of Kew, seeks peace and retirement after a generation of service. Manifold were the powers and duties of this worthy. In addition to being beadle, he was head-borough, constable of the manor court and herdsman. His beadleship gave him authority to whip naughty boys who talked in church, and attack sinners who broke the customs of the manor.

There are, however, plenty of beadles today, here as well as in England. They are the self-appointed variety. Lacking the historic robe, cocked hat and decorated staff, they are clothed in a shred of brief authority. The gaudy uniform may go, but the Bumble spirit we shall have always with us.—New York Herald Tribune.

History, when it repeats itself, is not responding to encores.

FAMILY DOCTOR MADE MILLIONS OF FRIENDS



Fifteen years after his graduation, Dr. Caldwell became famous for a single prescription which now, after forty years, is still making friends.

Today Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is the world's most popular laxative. Millions of people never think of using anything else when they're constipated, headachy, bilious, feverish or weak; when breath is bad, tongue coated, or they're suffering from nausea, gas, or lack of appetite or energy.

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is made today according to the original formula, from herbs and other pure ingredients. It is pleasant-tasting; thorough in the most obstinate cases; gently effective for women and children. Above all, it represents a doctor's choice of what is safe for the bowels.

Burns' Portrait Found

A Raeburn portrait of Robert Burns, painted in 1803 and lost for more than a century, is reported to have been found recently by a miner's wife in Larkhall, Scotland. The picture, said to be a striking likeness of Burns, is a canvas 27 by 23 inches inside the frame and carries an indistinct signature which experts believe to be that of Raeburn. It was "picked up for a few shillings," according to a Glasgow newspaper, in a second-hand furniture shop.

Yeah, this summer and then—next winter.

What is this community's best investment?

Well how is YOUR spiritual health today?

Some people think that a napkin is a slumber robe.

Some people think that rhubarb is a kind of wire fence.

Dutch : I want you to keep your nose in my business, out.

Strange: Even a dog knows a real friend when he sees one.

Did the bible tell the truth when it said that "strong drink is raging "

As usual, everybody differs in their notions as to what a newspaper ought to be used for.

Good Stuff: A fellow trying to buy a post card to send a friend commemorating ground hog day.

Get a kick out of life: Watch one automobile salesman try to sell another salesman a car by mistake.

Ridicule is the product of fools. Ignorance—the product of slavishness and a stubbornness not to learn willingly.

Different view points: The fellow that's hit "considers the source." The fellow that hits, considers what's hit.

Its just as safe and sensable to be on the safe side of any question as on the wrong side. The way people turn out proves it.

Jack Sharkey lost the big fight by hiting Max Schmelling, his opponent, two inches below the belt in his mixing bowl. Just another case where the stomach figured in again.

It might be that Bishop Cannon would tell the inquisitors more than they would like to know in the present quiz. That other side to every question is usually a dark horse.

A contemporary says, that enemies have produced more heroes than our friends. Right. Your friends drive you to drink and your enemies just can't make you drink. There you is.

A woman in Goshen sues her husband for divorce because he will not talk. Now see there. Here is a case where a woman had a chance to do all the talking and wasn't satisfied. And yet they say they are all alike.

Why don't they have a trade in value on the "Old Lady?" We know that the trade in value would not be placed on the "year" because no one knows how old they are. No doubt what we would get on a trade, would depend on the model.

There are two main reasons why people will divulge to the world the indignant contents of their minds. One is where the individual is personally injured and the other is where the country in which he lives is being damaged. The blood of Anglo Saxonism still runs true to form.

There are two ways in and out of every place but hell. Since you are still on earth you are still at large. And as long as you are at large you can feel safe that what ever happens to the prohibition cause in the fall election, will not endanger you in the least. If the law is repealed the repealers will have to produce a good government and that has never been done in or out of hell. The booze traffic put the Volstead law on the books and it will put another law on the books in case the present one is removed. Don't worry, son, don't worry. Every tub sits on its own bottom.

A powdered nose is no guarantee of a clean neck.

If people would only pray as hard to avoid war as they pray to win one.

Whether it is safe to follow your nose depends where your nose is going or where it is coming from. Whenever your nose goes anwhere, don't blow it.

When ever a person has to use a club to get people to thinking as he wishes them to think, he has made first admission that he is wrong. The truth always maintains itself unaided by force.

Naturalists do not believe that angleworms are ever actually rained down from the clouds. The appearance of angleworms in unusual places after a rain can generally be explained by other means. It is admitted however, that in some cases the presence of worms in certain places after a rain is difficult to explain. Whether or not whirlwinds and tornadoes sometimes scoop up the contents of a pond or other body of water and scatter them over the earth at a great distance is a disputed question. What is your opinion?

Readers of Editorials

Only twenty-one per cent—or about one out of every five—readers of newspapers read as much as one editorial regularly, according to a survey made by a scholar of the University of Iowa. The investigator further discovered that as editorial readers women rank still lower than men, while only one person out of twenty-one reads all the editorials.

All of which is rather discouraging for the earnest and laborious editor full of ideas and ideals who has felt that he was shaping public opinion, raising the standard of morality, stimulating the art of thinking and encouraging all good acts and aspirations. Now after all his high-minded endeavor he learns that when he broadcasts most people turn their radios off.

But there is one consolation. The investigator found that the content, the quality, of the editorial had nothing to do with the matter—that good editorials and poor ones fare just about alike. So the editor is as much without blame as he is without appreciation.

The New Fourth

Year by year the old-fashioned Fourth of July with spitting cannon and sizzling rocket against a blue-black sky is becoming more and more of a memory.

The Fourth of July which small boys and girls awaited as eagerly as Christmas itself, a day of toy torpedo, of celluloid-collared orators, and ice cream socials, has been transformed into an Independence Day of quiet and dignity.

"But how can we teach our children what Fourth of July really means?" a mother asked not long ago, adding, "you must meet a child on his own ground—things must be explained to him in terms that he understands."

This mother, who is fortunate enough never to have been forced to the tragic task of binding up mangled little fingers shredded by "innocent fire-crackers," is arguing that a child must be taught the meaning of liberty and freedom and independence by lighting a pin wheel or hurling a torpedo cane upon the pavement.

It is difficult for us who passed childhood in the old-fashioned noisy Fourth of July decade to remember that our Roman candles and "flower pots" meant anything lofty and inspiring to us—anything but a rolliking holiday.

Safe and sane Fourths are pretty well established but the argument that some way should be found to make green the meaning of what those periwigged builders of our nation did back on July 4, 1776, is a worthy one.

The great purpose of a Fourth of July observance is not only to pay respect to the early framers of this government but to measure the patriotism of this with that day, to determine whether this nation has been true to the faith, whether it has kept aloft the torch, whether its willingness to sacrifice for the common good deserves a place with the sacrifices of the fathers of the nation.

Family Trees Are in Bloom

Its about time every year that the family trees send forth their blooms, calling together its offspring round the mother tree and check up on the fallen leaves that have failed to weather the storms of life during the year passed by, and hear the announcements of the new sprouts that have come to life to bud and shoot leaves on the tree of the future.. To tell over and over again of the storms of life and the sunshine that turns the autumn green to gold, to joke at the color and the oddities of some of the other leaves of the tree and the blended brough from which it sprang. And to hear the spokesman of the day history-ize the olden days of the family trees of by gone seasons by repeating a part of the well known old poem, which says, "Let them smile as I do now, at the old forsaken bough where I cling."

Family reunion time will soon be here, when all the old relics of the family tree and organized society will gather once more to replenish fond memories by the usual embrace of by the "sometimes" usual renewal family quarrel that usually dampens things up quicker than a hasty shower. But in sunshine or tempest, they are to be numbered among the fast deminishing social events of the olden days when families enjoyed their coming together. Like the old fashioned community picnic, they are fading away—because of the older members of the family tree having passed on and because of the new faces that marry in and change the old tree and its personnel. Many family reunions have only two or three present who bare the name of the family they represent, all the rest are marriage relation. But in face of these tendencies they should be kept up, to keep burning the old fires of family interest and affection all of which will help keep the wood out of human nature.

Church Unity Seen Nearer

The church unity idea, which has been in the process of agitation for the last few years, now looms up as near possibility. In view of the strides made by the leaders of the major denominations towards organic unity and the reasons given by them for trying to unify Protestantism, it is plain the problem has in it some interesting buddings of new ideas or late interpretations of the scriptures relative to the mission of the Protestant Church of today. For these reasons we print the progress made to date in church unity in the hope of informing our readers of one of the greatest topics of the day—a question that involves more than 50,000,000 of church people and in part, influences the destiny of the nations of the earth.

The Federal Council of Churches of Christ, in connection with all the leading denominations, is at the present time, cooperatively established and in operation successfully. Since that time about one thousand church unions have sprung into existance. Twenty-two divergent Lutheran Synods have become centralized and the Baptists, Methodists and Presbyterians are making every effort to remove the sectionalism from their respective organizations.

The Presbyterians have nine groups, the Methodists have nineteen and the Baptists have eighteen. Other mergers are in process. The Reformed Church of the United States, the Evangelical Synod of North America and the United Brethren in Christ have agreed to try and effect a plan of unity and a general Council of Congregational and Christian Churches are making similar overtures. The German and the Dutch Reformed are both desirous of unity with the Presbyterians.

On last week at Atlanta, N. J., the Presbyterians, Methodists and the Episcopalians held a conference tending towards unity in which the Rt. Rev. Edward L. Parsons, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of California presided.

He stated that "much has been accomplished towards unity." He mentioned that as soon as unity was perfected in the respective branches, then the real process of unity could be expected. The conference adopted the following statement: "So far as other than theological and ecclesiastical factors were causes of the original separation of the bodies we represent, we are agreed that they are no longer operative in any such degree as to block the way to organic unity."

Another conference is to be held at the call of the chair in the near future. There is a precedent which the believers in unity look to, to ascertain whether the church is unitable and that is the United Church of Canada, where the Methodists, Congregational i s t s and the Presbyterians effected and successfully operated unity.

The reasons for this merger, first presented in 1902 were two fold and are as follows: "First, overlapping and unworthy competition in mission work in primitive western Canada; and second, in many small villages and towns, particularly in the sparce settled areas, resources were wasted and work was needlessly duplicated by two, three and four competative ministers, where one would suffice. We believe that the work of the church to be of such vast importanct that such things as sectionalism and unfriendly competition, must not be allowed to hinder its onward march.

The church cannot be said to be in a state of negligent stupor, thus bringing the condemnation of the world. Not that. The church has been in the right in existing and operating in its present form of segregation, because the world was not ready to receive unity and use it for pure and undefiled christianity as it now is. The time has arrived when the church is coming to its own—when it shall quietly merge and consumate itself to its original task of the master that sent it. Whatever difficulties may lie in the path of such a noble and unselfish union, it can be said that this opposition will melt away, as the true meaning and the benefits of such union come in sight.

Those who oppose unity at present, do so in the belief that unity, in the organic sense, would not guarantee spiritual unity, pointing to the fact that spiritual unity is or should be the main and the only real reason for such a union. The advocates for unity, say that if ever there was a time when unity is needed and when it ought to succeed, it is at the present time. The world is on the crest of a great wave of learning and if the church does not add to the world its spirituality to mix and control this intellectuality the world will be the worse for it. Knowledge is power. Unguided power is destructive. And then again, the enemies of the Protestant Church will make it impossible for it to be divided against itself. Any organization must be for itself in time of defense.

Favorite Bible Passages of Harvey Parnell

Governor of Arkansas.

Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: for this is the law and the prophets. —Matthew 7:12.

Comment: The Golden Rule fits admirably into the life of every one almost every moment of every day. The very fundamentals of our social and business standards are based with a psychological effect upon the true meaning and intent of this wonderful passage.

After this manner therefore pray ye: Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil: For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.—Matthew 6:9-13.

Comment: The Lord's Prayer has been indelibly imprinted on my mind and it affords quiet, peace and consolation at all times.

Wind is a Close Second to Fire

In destuction and damage to property, high winds are almost as culpable as fire. A wind need not be of tornado force to do serious damage; nor is wind damage a hazard peculiar to any section of the country. Exceedingly high and dangerous wind movements have occurred in almost every section of the country and history will undoubtedly repeat itself. Windstorm Insurance is very moderate in cost.

Lesson for June 22

THE RISEN LORD AND THE GREAT COMMISSION

GOLDEN TEXT—Go ye therefore and teach all nations.

LESSON TEXT—Matthew 28:1-20.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Carrying on Jesus' Work.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Our Marching Orders.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Our Marching Orders.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Great Commission.

I. The Empty Sepulchre (vv. 1-7).

1. The earthquake (vv. 1-4). This occurred when the glorious angel descended from heaven to roll the stone away from the tomb. This work of the angel was not to allow Jesus to escape, but to show that the tomb was empty. Christ needed not even the help of the angel, for He came forth from the grave by His own power as the seal of His atoning work on the cross (Rom. 1:4). The open tomb and the angel sitting upon the stone, with calm dignity, is a graphic picture of Christ's triumph over the devil, and the terror of the keepers is a sample of what all of Christ's enemies shall one day experience when He comes in glory to reign as King.

2. The angel's message to the women (vv. 5-7).

(1) Fear not (v. 5). While the enemies had occasion to fear, these women who loved the Lord received good news from the empty tomb. The empty tomb puts an end forever to all doubts and fears. Let every teacher endeavor to show the greatness of the fact that the tomb was empty, for it shows that we have a living Christ. The resurrection of Christ should be the major theme of those who give out the Christian message. (2) "Come, see" (v. 6). The angel told the women that the Lord had risen and invited them to see the place where He lay. The Lord made special effort to convince the disciples of the reality of His resurrection. He remained with them for forty days, giving them many "infallible proofs." (3) "Go quickly" (v. 7). Having seen for themselves, their responsibility was to go and tell the message. Experience is necessary before testimony. They were to go quickly to the disciples with the message, assured that the Lord would go before and meet them.

II. The Risen Lord Meets the Women (vv. 8-10).

The women quickly obeyed the command of the angel, and were running to bring word to the disciples. Jesus met them on the way. Those who have an experimental knowledge of Christ should go speedily to tell others of it. When they saw Jesus—that He was really the Lord—they worshiped Him.

III. Paying Money to Circulate a Lie (vv. 11-15).

That Jesus arose from the dead could not be denied even by the Sanhedrin. They saw only one way out of the difficulty; that was to bribe the keepers to tell a lie. They had paid money for His betrayal—now they paid more money to circulate a lie about His resurrection. This shows the wonderful power that money has over the lives and consciences of men. It not only induces people to lie, but it even muzzles the mouths of some teachers and preachers.

IV. The King's Great Commission (vv. 16-20).

1. The royal authority (v. 18).

By virtue of His divine authority, He issued this command to the disciples. In order to prepare them for the reception of this command, He declared unto them that all power in heaven and earth had been given unto Him.

2. The commission itself (vv. 19, 20).

It consists of three parts. (1) Go teach all nations. This is the first and primary business of the disciple. This command has been issued to all disciples by the risen and mighty Lord. (2) Baptize them in the name of the triune God. Those who have become disciples of the Lord should receive the rite which signifies that relationship to Him. (3) Teach them to observe all of Christ's commandments (v. 20). Those who have become Christ's disciples should be taught conformity to His will.

3. The available power (v. 2).

Those who obey Christ in carrying out this commission shall enjoy His abiding presence.

Prayer the Golden Key

Prayer is a golden key which should open the morning and lock up the evening.—Bishop Hopkins.

Making Short Cuts

There are plenty of cuts across corners that one can make in life, in education, in business, in politics, in religion. But there is really no short cut to any promised land.—Edgar Whitaker Work, D. D.

Should Have Jesus With Us

What lessons the sea teaches us. It is calm like life at times, then stormy, also like life, causing shipwrecks. If we sail life's sea, we should have Jesus with us in the ship.—Morris Martin.

"A WONDERFUL HELP TO ME"

Read What Mrs. Arnold Says About Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Dothan, Ala.—"What a wonderful help Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has been to me. I was so nervous and rundown I couldn't be up half the time. When I had taken one bottle of Vegetable Compound I could tell I felt better, so I took seven bottles and I recommend it highly. It helped my nerves and keeps me strong to do my housework and wait on four little children. I hope some other suffering woman will try it."—Mrs. Porter L. Arnold, 1013 S. CHAPTER XI—Continued

—13—

Silvers was at first inclined to be disappointed at the mildness of the punishment meted out to his enemy. The tarpaulin was removed from the sixteen-foot cutter stepped on davits outside the rail and the cook lifted with difficulty and dumped into it. Then the covering was replaced and the boat swung again over the rail.

"This is an interesting sort of game, Augustus," Bettington remarked, "and your part in it, so far, has been worth fifty dollars to you. Do you want to earn more?"

"Is each of them guys worth fifty bones?"

"Metzger is worth a hundred. I want them one at a time. How can you get Metzger here?"

"That's a pipe," said Augustus, his eyes glistening. "He'll want to know where the cook is. I'll say he's up here with the Jane he's stuck on and that you've got the other."

"All right," said Bettington. "A hundred dollars if you work it right."

Silvers found Metzger sleeping. It was easy to make enough noise to awaken him. He sat up with an oath and demanded that the cook be sent in with something to eat. Silvers' sly smile angered him. He seized the boy's arm and spun him round.

"What are you grinning for?" he cried.

The boy edged toward the door.

"I was just thinkin' how cook's put one over on you after all. While you've been sleepin' him and the Doc has been showing the skirts a good time on deck."

With a bellow Metzger drew his knife and rushed up the stairs. In moments of rage such as these he cared nothing for caution. He had been a fool to spare the handsome doctor so long.

The handsome doctor dropped the noose accurately over his neck and choked him into submission. And Metzger, gagged and bound, was dropped by the cook's side.

"That's a hundred and fifty," said Silvers happily.

"Silvers, tell Kenzie I want to see him for a minute," Bettington ordered.

Blinking, the engineer came into the bright light.

"Do you suppose," Bettington began, "that when this cruise is over, you'll ever get the chance to work on a craft like this again?"

Kenzie shook his head sadly. He would end his days patching up marine junk, he supposed. This voyage was the purple patch in his gray life. There would never be another.

"Listen to me," Bettington said. "I think if my scheme is successful that Mrs. Radway will retain you permanently. All I want you to do is to keep steam up and join in no raid against me."

"H—l," said Kenzie, "that's easy. What do I want to join in any scraps for?"

"They may make you think it's necessary. Is it a promise?"

Kenzie thrust out an oily paw.

Bettington wrung it heartily. Of all the men on board, he thought Kenzie alone had a face to be trusted.

Bob had witnessed the two encounters and wanted to know what was coming. Was it possible that Todd had been wrong in his estimate of the doctor?

Bettington would tell him nothing. Instead, he changed the course of the vessel. "We'll run for New York," he said. "We shall have favoring winds and it won't take much longer." He felt certain that there would be no trouble with the gamblers for many hours. By that time some new plan could be evolved for their overthrow.

He was rather concerned for himself. In the fight with Sam he had been badly bruised and now the great exertion of lifting the two men into the boat agonized him. When he had sent Silvers below and cautioned him to report any new development, he stretched himself on the couch.

"I'm going to try to get a little rest," he told Bob. "Wake me if necessary and let no one come on deck but Silvers. Those men in the cutter can't get adrift."

Bob forgot the perils which hedged him and his about in this new-found joy of guiding a big boat. Full steam ahead was indicated on the gauge and he was heading for home. Crosby had told him that the only explanation of the doctor's change of heart—if it were genuine and borne out by deeds—was the hope of winning a pardon. He had insisted that a double murderer would have little hesitation in adding another victim to his score if it seemed necessary. But Todd would not believe that Orme, as he called him always in speaking to Mrs. Radway, had repented. They were bound for a foreign port and when they were no longer under the jurisdiction of the American flag anything could happen. In his moments of depression Crosby Todd thought uneasily of what would happen to him. Dr. Andrew Orme had looked at him with an expression that did not speak of mercy.

Todd experienced bitter moments of which the others guessed nothing. He had allowed himself to be fooled by Graumann over the wireless and had lost the opportunity to send messages that might have saved them. It seemed necessary for the common good to refuse to listen to any of Mrs. Radway's speculations about the possibility that the doctor was their sincere friend. Mary made common cause with her fiance against Bettington.

What a brave and steadfast child she was, thought the elder woman. Here, at the threshold of a new and fuller life, she was likely to be stayed by death. For her own part, life held no more prospects. And like Mary, she, too, was to be halted on the threshold. For a few glorious moments she had been conscious of her destiny; and now she knew they were only moments of self-deception. Women had always envied her for beauty, wealth and position. None had ever envied her for her happiness. Happiness was, broadly speaking, the common lot. She had been given everything else.

There was no morbidity in dwelling on the fate that was enwrapping her. She could not have lived so long and seen so much, without being aware of the lawlessness of men's desires. She thought of Metzger's burning eyes: Sam was gone, but her menace remained. And perhaps this strange man, whom she knew now to be Andrew Orme, escaped convict and twice a murderer, loved her. In her heart she was convinced of it. . . . Never, never would she let any human being know that she, too, had loved him, a murderer! A man for whom not even the most splendid of heroism could win pardon. A man for ever without the pale.

* * * * * * *

Those elements of lawlessness in the individuals of the crew, which Clements, by his adroitness and the terror he inspired, had contrived to keep in subjection, were not long to lie dormant. Already unaccustomed ease and freedom from duties had awakened in men, to whom all honest work was abhorrent, the desire for a continuance of these romantic conditions.

The four in the forecastle experienced much of the feeling that Aladdin must have known when his lamp proved so obedient a servant. It was with a certain timidity, covered by an air of bravado, that they first made demands on Silvers for food and drink. They ordered; he obeyed. They sent him for Radway's famous cigars; Silvers brought a humidor filled with them. Mike suggested champagne. The genie they had known as Silvers delivered it to them.

Hamner was chicken-hearted. He believed that his arrest at some time or other was certain. And there were lifers in at least two of those convict establishments to which he might be sent who had threatened to kill him. And they would succeed. He had been a trusty and he had been a stool-pigeon. Alone of the men he had a profound distrust of Bettington. He thought the surgeon was going to try to help Mrs. Radway and so save his skin. Two could play at that game. If he so stirred up the three plastic men before him—that they attacked Metzger and Pereira and killed them—and he felt this would be the result—he could be hurrying to the doctor with the news and implore him to mete out justice to the slayers.

It was a pretty scheme and his expression annoyed Graumann. "What are you grinning for?" he snarled. "What makes you so d—n happy?"

"I was thinkin'," Hamner returned, "how good and surprised them dagoes'd be if we went aft and turned 'em out of the Boss' quarters and made them come here where they belong. There they sit and wait till we get to Limon. They speak the lingo; we don't. They'll speak us into jail before we know it. You know what them Central American prisons are. Nothing won't ever get us out. We won't even know what we're in for."

"That's a fack," Mike agreed. "I was in one in Bahia and I don't know yet why, unless it was for throwing a bull off the dock."

"If we had to shoot 'em," said Hamner, "we'd say it was because they tried to get at the women folk. That'd listen good at home."

"He's got a head on him," Mike said, with genuine admiration. "That stuff gets over every time, believe me. 'Brave seamen save the women and children first.'"

Red Mike was one of those drunkards who, after a sufficient amount of poison, lose the more obvious marks of intoxication. Where the other three slept stertorously he was kept awake by the growing ferocity he felt toward Metzger and Pereira. It was about seven o'clock when he roused his reluctant comrades from their slumbers. They awaked sober but savage. It was not hard to bring them to their last night's mood of vengeance. The bottles on the table helped them to that.

It was decided then and there to hunt for the traitors. Every stateroom and storeroom was drawn blank. The two must be on the upper deck with their crony the surgeon. That would make three against four.

Graumann was chosen to ask leave to speak with the autocratic navigator, and while speaking, locate the missing men.

Bettington listened to Graumann's story when he had given permission, through Silvers, for him to come on deck. He entertained a profound mistrust of the man.

"Well," Bettington said, seeing him gazing about him. "What is it?"

"I was wondering if the cook was up here, sir. We ain't seen him in the galley nor Mr. Metzger neither."

"Do they look to be here?"

Graumann glanced toward the wireless house. It was their only possible hiding place. Bettington watched him sidle up to it.

"Are they there?" the surgeon asked, as if interested in their disappearance. Graumann took this as an invitation to investigate.

"I guess they're below," he said, touching his cap.

His news added to the wrath of the tricked four. It was plain they could only be in the fore part of the ship immediately above the forecastle where the men were now sitting.

"What Makes You So D—n Happy?"

"There they are, the stinkin' dagoes," said Hamner, "eating and drinking with the women, while anything is good enough for us. If I was as strong as you boys I wouldn't stand it, no, not for one minute. Just overhead, they are, a laughin' at the monkeys they've made of us. We ought to break in. Graumann here, he knows how to open any kiester ever made; it won't take him long to do the trick."

Mike battered the table with his iron fists.

"No, by G—d," he shouted, "that's not the way I work. We'll batter the door down."

With bars of iron, Mike made his first savage onslaught. The noise in the quarters of the prisoned people was deafening; Mary clung to Crosby. She saw Mrs. Radway take the automatic. During intervals of this battering they could hear the most horrible oaths hurled, as they believed, at themselves alone.

To Mrs. Radway it meant that the doctor had been, as she had feared, tricked into helplessness. This was the end.

Bettington, on hearing the extraordinary racket, ran to the head of the companion. The shouts of Mike and his friends warned him of grave danger. Mike, Graumann and Krause were trying to batter their way to the women; there was no other explanation possible.

"Stop," he shouted.

His voice arrested them for a moment.

"We want Metzger and Pereira," they told him.

"They are not in there," cried Bettington.

"Then where are they hiding?" Graumann snarled.

The doctor's unreadiness to answer promptly seemed direct proof that he was lying. Krause pulled out his revolver and took aim at Bettington, shouting obscene abuse as he did so. It was no moment for hesitation. Bettington shot first. Krause spun round—a bullet had gone through the hand that held the weapon. Another gun spat out and Graumann fell shot through the heart. Bettington glanced round and saw Hamner's smoking barrel.

"Saved your life them, Doc," said Hamner heartily.

It was Hamner's treachery which staggered Mike and made him fall an easy victim to arrest. Bettington slipped a clove hitch over his wrist. Mike was led to the chain locker and pushed in. Hamner, although he was betraying joy at the result of the fray, knew in his heart that until Mike was dead he was in hourly peril. Hamner cursed his inaccuracy of aim. He had meant to kill Mike, and by a jerky, nervous pull on the trigger had slain Graumann. Graumann he could have managed. But Mike!

Silvers had brought Kenzie up from his engines. The boy had become panic stricken. He could not understand how it was Hamner had emerged with so stainless a reputation. Hamner was engaged in the necessary business of cleaning up. No longer filled with visions of vengeance, Krause followed Bettington to the doctor's room, where his wound was dressed. He did not venture to protest when he was locked in a small room.

Things were going rather well for Hamner, but he still was in some perplexity as to where Metzger and Pereira might be. Thinking it over, and bearing in mind Andrew Orme's justly earned reputation for violence, what was more likely than they had been done away with and dumped into the ocean?

Hamner was evolving a story whereby he enacted the role of Sir Galahad and Providence together. In the end it would be seen that, but for him, the voyage would have finished in utter disaster. He determined to attach himself to Mrs. Radway. He had been, formerly, a specialist in those hard-luck stories whose success depended upon feminine sympathy.

CHAPTER XII

The Treachery of Friends

After the first amazing clamor was stilled and Crosby Todd had whispered some comforting phrases to Mary, two shots rang out. Then came Krause's yell of agony. After that there was a silence of half-an-hour. But the three, waiting as they expected for death, made no move.

Out of the silence came three staccato double raps, the signal by which the doctor was known.

"Don't open!" said Todd, hoarsely. "It's a trick."

"I must know," Mrs. Radway said, and unbolted the door.

Bettington stood there. He was pale and unsmiling.

"I'm afraid you have been very much frightened," he began. "I'm sorry; but it has turned out fortunate after all. I control the boat at last and you are free to use the upper deck when you want to."

"Do you mean the dreadful danger has passed?"

He looked down at her and smiled just for a moment.

"I think so. I shall want Todd up there at once."

Todd came forward. "Well?"

"Don't go anywhere but on deck and these quarters of yours. I have very good reasons."

He bowed to Mrs. Radway and went out.

"What's happened?" Bob cried eagerly when he was relieved at the wheel.

"Murder and sudden death," said Bettington. "You'll be able to see your sister and your esteemed friend Todd soon. Ah, here they come."

Evelyn Radway seemed paler and more slender than he had ever seen her. He reflected that she had endured agonizing hours compared with which his own had been as nothing.

Briefly he told them of the struggle just over.

"But what about Metzger and the cook?" Todd asked.

"I am coming to them." He turned to Mrs. Radway and the girl. "Don't be frightened."

He swung the davits round so that the cutter was over part of the deck. Then, with the aid of Silvers who had hurried up, he lowered it a bit and removed the covering.

The two women shrank back at the sight.

"I'm going to make the cook work in the stokehole," he announced. "He is not dangerous without a knife and he'll have no chance to get one this side of eternity. I shall lock Metzger up until we reach New York."

"New York?" said Mary, smiling for the first time.

"We're heading for home now," he answered.

Todd was bombarding Bob in the wheelhouse with innumerable questions. He voiced again his suspicion of the doctor and speculated as to what his motive might be.

Hamner, polishing brass, crept near enough to hear what they were saying. Evidently Hallett's nephew writhed under the authority of Andy Orme. That was a new angle to look at the future from.

"Beg pardon, gentlemen," said Hamner urbanely, "but is there anything I can get for you? You'll be taking command, sir, I suppose?" He addressed Todd. "You're the only officer aboard now your pore uncle's gone."

"You see," said Todd, when Hamner had gone away unanswered, "what they think. It's abominable how a doctor, and such a doctor, is allowed to take command." He forgot that his qualifications were nil. Bob's sympathy was very grateful.

It was easy for Hamner to mold these young and enthusiastic lads to his liking. Already they had commended him highly to Mrs. Radway. But she persisted in her mistrust.

"Look at them," she said to Mary, when they had slept themselves into better spirits. "Are they conspiring together?"

"Crosby wants to get all the evidence he can," Mary answered. "You see, he's really an officer and will have to be chief witness. He says this will be a celebrated case."

"Not if I can help it," Evelyn Radway said. The idea of widespread publicity was abhorrent.

"May I wireless to my lawyers?" she asked of the doctor. She had been told indignantly by Todd that he had been locked out of his own quarters.

"Of course," he answered. "I forbade Todd because he was for wiring accounts to the papers. May I ask you to see that he sends no other messages?"

"I will look after that," she said. "When can we get to New York?"

"Let me see," he meditated. "This is Tuesday noon. We ought to be in by Thursday afternoon. I think you may safely promise that."

Instead of Bob Unwin being allowed to remain on deck and talk to Todd, he was sent below to aid the weary Kenzie. It was plain to Mrs. Radway that Bettington had deliberately broken up the committee on grievances.

"Mary," she said abruptly to the girl, "I'm going to live at my home up the Hudson. It is near Peekskill and perched on the top of a hill with a marvelous view of the river. It's very, very big. I was wondering if your father would care to live there, too, and act as a sort of secretary and generally useful business man. There would be a great deal to do and I think the place would benefit Mrs. Unwin. Of course, you'd be there, too."

"Oh, Mrs. Radway," cried the enraptured Mary, "there is nothing in the whole world that could make me happier. How he hates his work, poor old dear. May I break it to him?"

"You shall wireless him to meet us on Thursday and tell him whatever you choose."

On Wednesday night Bettington informed Mrs. Radway that he hoped to be in early on the following morning.

"You talk as if you were used to be in," she said.

"I am," he answered. "I want to be done with this nightmare business."

She could not understand why it was he did not appear to dread the end of the trip which spelled for him—prison.

"I shall instruct my attorneys to put themselves at your service," she said presently. It was not easy to say what she desired to tell him. "I know nothing of the reasons you shipped on the Albatross. I know only that you have brought us into safety and I am grateful."

"You could have heard what brought me aboard if you had wanted to," he reminded her. "Why not listen to the whole thing now?"

She had a dread of hearing some confession which must rob her of the confidence she stubbornly held to.

Indian Ruler Famous for Astronomical Study

There lived in India, in the Seventeenth century, a ruler known as Maharajah Jai Singh II, and being keenly interested in astronomy he evolved a series of structures which, though not now used for practical purposes, constitute the most unique astronomical instruments in existence. He appears to have collected all kinds of astronomical books, and sent some workers to foreign countries to gather information. Having determined the kind of instruments required on which to make the necessary recording of the movements of the heavenly bodies, he selected five places in India as the centers in which the observations should be taken. The first he built at Delhi, and then others in Jaipur, Ujain, Benares, and Mathura. The observatories in Delhi and Jaipur have been carefully restored. In addition to a number of metal instruments he erected large masonry instruments, some of them as high as 90 feet. Very careful records were made of the observations of his staff of workers, and modern astronomers have expressed surprise at the valuable information thus collected. The ruler responsible for these interesting instruments died in 1743 and his wives, concubines and science expired with him on his funeral pyre.

Helpful Suggestion

An employer who believed in supporting all efforts to introduce a new spirit into industry, had called his men together to place before them his plans for bettering working conditions.

"Now whenever I enter the workshop," he said, "I want to see every man cheerfully performing his task, and therefore I invite you to place in this box any suggestions as to how that can be brought about."

A few days later he opened the box and took out a slip of paper on which was written: "Take the rubber heels off your shoes."

Bold

Three little four-year-olds of Broad Ripple were discussing in a very serious way what they were going to do when they grew up. Joe said he was going to shoot lions. The next little fellow was going to get on a train and ride forever. The third, Donald, wanted to be more daring than the rest and in a babyish voice said: "I'm going to buy an ice cream cone and get on the street car and eat it."—Indianapolis News.

Vicar's Patience Tried

"This is enough to try the patience of Job," exclaimed the vicar to his wife, after reading the newspaper. "Last Sunday I preached from the text, 'Be ye, therefore, steadfast,' and the printers have made it read, 'Be ye there for breakfast.'" — Border Cities Star.

HISTORY'S MYSTERIES

Unsolved Riddles That Still Puzzle Authorities Here and Abroad

The Fate of "Fighting Mac"

THE son of a Scotch laborer, Hector MacDonald commenced his eventful life in the most prosaic of manners—first as a barefoot plowboy and then as a clerk in a country store. As far back as he could remember, however, he had wanted to be a soldier and, as soon as he was old enough, he enlisted as a private in the Gordon Highlanders, carrying the musket of a private soldier. Then, during the Afghan campaign of 1879, came the opportunity which was to mean so much to him.

In company with a small body of men, MacDonald found himself surrounded by some two thousand or more natives, bent upon the total destruction of the British soldiers. The officers having been shot, MacDonald took command of the detachment and led them in a dashing bayonet charge which ripped the ranks of the enemy wide open and cut a lane through which the English marched to safety. As a reward for his exceptional bravery, Lord Roberts offered MacDonald his choice of the Victoria Cross or an officer's commission and, without a moment's hesitation, the Scotchman chose the latter, despite the fact of the prejudice existing against the exceptional officer who had battled his way up from the ranks.

During the years that followed, MacDonald's career was one of almost continual success. During the Sudan campaign he was raised to the rank of colonel in appreciation of his defeat of a Dervish attack upon the British flank and, during the Boer war, his military accomplishments were so marked that he was knighted and made a brigadier general.

During the intervening years, however, he had been constantly waging another war—one against the prejudice and enmity of certain officers of the army who were jealous of the former private's advancement and who, in consequence, tried to do everything in their power to belittle and humiliate him. The honors which General MacDonald received at the hands of the queen wiped out some of these scores but only intensified others and, after his appointment to the command of the military post at Ceylon, certain grave charges were preferred against him which were undoubtedly without the slightest foundation.

His nerves frayed by the constant strain under which he had labored and feeling that he had been abandoned by the friends he had made, Sir Hector applied for leave of absence in order to return to London, where he had a personal interview with Lord Roberts, who is reported to have advised him to return to Ceylon and fight the accusations to the limit. Other officials of the war office were outspoken in their demands for an instant court-martial, but whether this radical step was taken has never been made public.

"Fighting Mac," as he was affectionately known to the rank and file of the British army, accordingly left London supposedly for the Orient, but only proceeded as far as Paris where he registered at a rather secluded hotel and kept strictly to himself. Not long afterward all England was amazed by the news of the suicide of the general, who was reported to have sent a bullet through his head after reading an account of the charges against him.

But his reported death by no means ended the strange sequence of events connected with his career. Although the Scotch soldier was supposed to be a bachelor, his family was informed that the general's widow had taken the body back to Scotland and that the interment had taken place quietly, with no military honors whatever. Little by little a rumor gained credence to the effect that "Fighting Mac" was not dead, but that he had returned to the Orient under an assumed name and had offered his services to the Mikado—one story stating that the famous General Kuroki, who attained such prominence during the Russo-Japanese war, was none other than the Scotch general. But the British war office took no cognizance of these reports and adhered to its original statement about General MacDonald's death in Paris.

Incidentally, the commission of inquiry into the charges against him in Ceylon returned a report completely absolving him from all blame—but no inquiry, official or otherwise, has ever swept away the veil of mystery which surrounds the fate of one of the most gallant officers who ever fought under the British flag.

Trachoma on Decrease

Trachoma is less prevalent among the Indians of Arizona and New Mexico than it has been. A survey made in 1912 was repeated in 1928. In the 11 tribes under observation there was a reduction of about 64 per cent in the incidence of trachoma. About 4,700 Indians were examined in 1912, and nearly one-fourth of them had trachoma. In 1928, after supervision and treatment in the interval, 6,700 Indians were examined, and less than 9 per cent were found to be so affected.

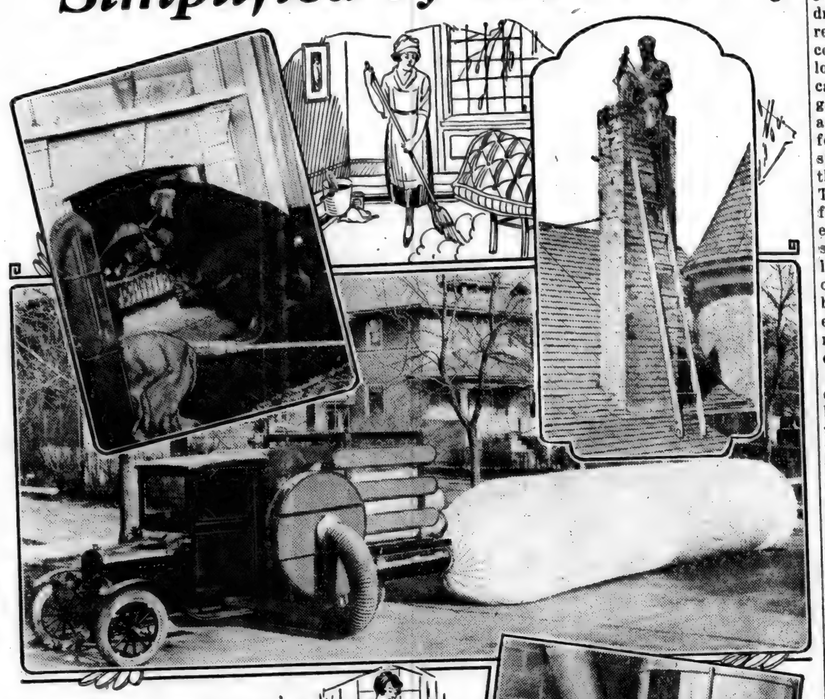
Task of House Cleaning Simplified by Machinery



Similar to the broom, the chimney-sweep has been supplanted by the vacuum cleaner, such as illustrated in the middle picture. It does the dirty job of cleaning the heating plant without muss or fuss, the dirt being sucked into the huge dirt-bag to be taken away. Picture at lower right shows how the big cleaner is attached to openings in the heating plant and the chimney by means of flexible piping.

Housewives Eliminate Drudgery by the Use of Modern Equipment and One-Room-at-Time Plan—Include Heating System in Cleaning Schedule.

TO WOMANKIND, the immaculately clean, spick and span house is a factor making for keen pleasure. When house cleaning is over, the average man breathes a sigh of relief. And the homemaker, you can be certain, visualizes with a peculiar dread a thorough house cleaning. Mentally she experiences the bare floors and sketchy meals and the wearisomeness and tired back of past house cleaning days. She quite forgets that house cleaning today is not nearly so wearisome nor so arduous as in the days of the shutoff parlor and base burner.

Planning and doing housework is made more easy by conveniences and facilities unknown a decade ago. Perhaps due to the fact that the male element has not viewed the periodical house cleaning with any degree of satisfaction or welcome, it is men who have devised machinery that has been of almost incalculable benefit to the housewife in house cleaning times.

The real secret of easy house cleaning lies in having efficient tools with which to work and a systematic although flexible house cleaning plan. These give the homemaker a feeling of readiness to commence the house cleaning and eliminate that subconscious desire that so often manifests itself to wait until tomorrow.

In most homes the vacuum cleaner occupies the post of duty held for so many years by the broom. This practical unit of household equipment not only saves the labor of at least one person during house cleaning time, but its ease of operation and thoroughness in cleaning are a genuine boon. This is especially true where women utilize the attachments that accompany modern vacuum cleaners.

At house cleaning time the modern homemaker in addition to her electrical cleaner has a whisk broom and dust pan, a dust mop, a long handled wall-brush and a stepladder that locks automatically. She also has a generous supply of cheese-cloth for dusting and polishing, a chamois, scouring powders, soap and soap flakes. If the water supply is hard, she also has several packages of a water softening powder. Soft water readily emulsifies soap, making cleaning much easier, because the thoroughly soapy solution more readily "cuts" grease and dirt. Furthermore, soft water is easier on the hands and doesn't harden them as does hard water.

The best way to get the house cleaning done quickly and easily is to systematize the job. It is a good idea to go through the house with pad and pencil, noting the various things to be done, and the order in which they can be done the easiest. In houses of more than one story, it is usually convenient to commence cleaning at the top of the house and work down to the basement. If the home occupies one floor, it is better to work from the front toward the back.

If outside help is called in for the heavy work, such as cleaning rugs, washing windows, polishing woodwork and floors, the various tasks should be completed one by one. However, if the work must be done by the homemaker herself only such work as can easily be accomplished during a day should be planned for one day.

With the smaller living quarters of today, the practical and easy way is to clean and put a single room in order each day. It is not necessary to do everything all at once. Many women will appreciate this plan of doing a single room at a time, because it combines a number of light tasks with a few heavy ones. This is not so fatiguing as spending an entire day cleaning and polishing floors, or some other heavy task, and, best of all, when one room at a time is cleaned and put in order, there is no general upheaval of the house and "there is a bed to sleep in at night."

The work seems to proceed more smoothly on the one-room schedule, if the curtains are removed and washed first; next may come the cleaning and putting of closets, drawers, or cupboards in order; then cleaning pictures and bric-a-brac. After these minor things are out of the way, the ceiling may be dusted with a long-handled brush. Then the rug, heavy draperies, upholstered furniture or mattresses may be cleaned with the vacuum cleaner without removing them from the room.

If the woodwork is painted, it should be washed with soap and water, then rinsed with clean water and dried immediately with a soft cloth. For natural finished woodwork and wood furniture, a good combination cleaning and polishing preparation often gives better results than polish that merely oils over the soiled wood.

The vogue for lacquered ware provides an easy way to refinish furniture that may be chipped or scarred. Instead of laboriously coaxing it back to life by repeated polishing, the housewife will find it easier and more satisfactory to treat it with a coat or two of quick drying lacquer. Thus it can be adapted to room color schemes and the freshly lacquered pieces will have a pleasing touch of newness.

Somewhere in the course of house cleaning must come the cleaning of the heating system. According to the Holland Institute of Thermology of Holland, Mich., the heating system should be thoroughly cleaned at least once each year for three cardinal reasons, namely, economy, safety and cleanliness. It does not take much soot to deprive a heating plant of a great deal of its heating efficiency. Government engineers have found through careful tests that one-eighth inch of soot on the heating surface of a furnace will reduce the plant's efficiency 25 per cent or more, and the amazing revelation was made that one-quarter inch of soot will cut a plant's heating efficiency nearly 50 per cent. It is quite obvious that a thorough cleaning will be the means of saving considerable money.

The second factor is the safety factor. Most home fires are due to defects in the chimney and in the flue pipe. Chimneys settle, their linings disintegrate and become cracked. The sulphurous gases and extreme heat variations cause further damage, including disintegration of mortar joints. The result is that sparks often find their way through these cracks into the framework of the house. The flue pipe leading from heating plant to the chimney becomes corroded and rusted and dotted with holes through which sparks may find their way into the basement.

Third, although but a small portion of the dirt that finds its way into the house comes from the heating plant, about 25 per cent, according to engineers who have studied the subject, it is, of course, highly desirable that even this be eliminated, which cleaning does. Obviously, the thing to do is to have the heating plant cleaned. The best way, according to the Holland Institute, is the vacuum cleaning way. It is the cleanest and most thorough method ever devised. The vacuum cleaner for cleaning furnaces is a giant among vacuum cleaners. In fact, it is so big that it must be transported to the job mounted on a specially designed motor truck. It is equipped with a powerful suction fan operated by an individual motor. This big cleaner is connected with openings in the heating system and to the chimney by means of a long flexible pipe. With the placing of the suction fan in operation, the powerful suction draws every bit of soot, dust and dirt from every part of the heating plant, even those nooks and crannies which are so difficult to clean by hand.

The soot and dirt drawn from the heating system is immediately blown into a dirt bag. This dirt bag is several thousand times larger than that attached to the ordinary household vacuum cleaner. It is 40 feet long and when inflated stands about six feet high. All the dirt and soot goes into this big dirt bag without a bit of dust getting into the basement or on the lawn. In fact, the laundress or even the decorators may be at work in the house while the heating system is being cleaned by the vacuum method with no detriment to their work.

Responsible operators of equipment of this sort make a thorough examination and test of the heating plant and chimney. The cleaning is so thoroughly done that the operators are able to easily locate any defects that may have developed in the chimney or elsewhere in the heating system. Of course, the practical thing to do is to have such defects remedied ere serious trouble develops. Most heating troubles are due to poor draft and the simple and easy solution is thoroughly cleaning of the heating system. Because of the size of the chimney opening, the flue pipe and the interior of the heating system, it is advisable to employ the use of cleaners that are equipped with a large, powerful suction fan operated by its own power unit. Equipment of this sort assures a thorough, dependable cleaning job and that is what the housewife wants.

A gratifying feature of house cleaning today is that what were formerly the most laborious tasks can now be done with the aid of machinery. Modern household equipment brings new ways to do old tasks and if homemakers will take advantage of these things, and will have the heating system thoroughly cleaned, they will have cleaner homes all the time.

WOMEN CLING TO THEIR EMANCIPATION

Recent press dispatches from France coming over the waves have in them the news that the French designers of women's dress have given up the fight to return women to the styles of the colony days, when they wore them long. The women of the Americas and England have rebelled against their style slave masters and add only a half foot to their former abbreviations and feel satisfied and seem to be conscious that the world is likewise at ease. This rebellion on the part of the female dress element, is to be taken as announcement from the Eve side of the garden that they no longer will permit the designers of fashions to lead them around by their powdered noses any longer or to be patted into silent submission on their cosmetic rosy cheeks.

For many years fashioners have capitolated on the weaknesses of both sexes in wearing garb and their craze for style and individuality in toggery, telling them when to forsake the old and adopt the new, how to improve shapes or actually create them, by corset staves, bustles, wigs, switches, hoops, spool heel shoes, etc.

After awhile and upon the demand of the commercial world, all accessories and annexations were laid aside, and the pendulum of taste swung to the other extreme in which the styles were indicative of a wool and cotton famine on the earth. Scarceties of feminine attire, while intended for the best, was the cause of many magazines coming into existance to pictorially amuse and antagonize the world in picture and comment until the designers thought that the time had come for the fruit basket to be up set and at last start out for "Paradise Regained" by bringing back the long-ies of the olden days.

But commercialism had done its work of emancipation and the ladies of the office, and professionaldom just didn't follow the pied piper and even refused to dance. In their days of whirl and squirrel human activities, full of dash and go, long trains of clothes could hardly keep up with the modern individual in the daily dash for cash and hash, so the defeat came.

Spencer, in his book on education, says, "that dress in order of time has always been preceded by decoration." The idea of dress came out of the idea of clothing the body for ornamental purposes and creating an impression on the opposite sex or the other natives in the desire to be well thought of. As civilization advanced and mankind lived more in the open more clothing became necessary to satisfy the depeloped conscience and the safe guards against obscenity, until now we clothe ourselves for reason of necessity, comfort, style and the demands of organized society.

When woman came into her rights of full suffrage, being suddenly liberated from all that had kept her in social subjugation (supposed to be for her own betterment) she ran wild in adornment for a generation or two, following submissively to all and every change in society's scenery as if her life depended on it.

But now comes the best part of the story. Woman has come into her own. She is filling her place in the world. Laws will be made and enforced by her. The hand that rocks the cradle shall indeed rule the world, in deed as well as in theory.

Women who have tired of the incapabilities of the man side of creation in giving a bad account of their stewardshp in governmental and social capacities have agreed amongst themselvs that womanity is one half of humanity and that they expect to see to it that the generations that come into the world thru her life blood and sacrifices must be ruled by her councils. Woman says that brains, morals and politics are neither masculine nor feminine, and that conditions must be corrected regardless. It is this new place of action of the women of the world that has caused her to emphasize the utilitarian side of dress rather than the original decorative reason for dress alone. While the effect of the style makers on the world are not as yet removed, it is plain that the designers will conform more closely to common sense and decency in their pendulum sweeps from the short doll clothes to the mummy draperies of long ago. Necessity shall be the mother of invention in dress as well as in the inventive world. Style can satisfy all the requirements of dress and still edify and be an honor to its wearer.

Three Accidents In a Week

Returning home from a show at Hicksville, late Friday evening, Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Cochran figured in an automobile accident, resutling in a badly damaged car, Mrs. Cochran being severely cut on right arm and Charles being cut and bruised up.

The accident took place about two miles east of Newville, where they were crowded off the road, by what Charles thought was two cars racing. The Cochran car was crowded off the road on the north side into the grass, and he run about 100 feet, thinking that he would be able to pull into the road. When he pulled into a deeper part of the ditch, he then struck a telephone pole, resulting in the injuries.

Mrs. Cochran was riding with her arm resting in the window.

Two young men came along just then and stopped, seeing their condition they took Mr. and Mrs. Cochran to the Dr. Brunson home at Newville, where Mrs. Cochran was given medical aid.

The E. R. Kinsey ambulance was called and she was rushed to Garrett to the hospital where she still remains under the care of the doctor. She also suffers from shock, and the loss of blood makes her very weak.

Mr. Cochran was given medical attention and was able to return home Saturday.

Levi Rowe, living three miles north of St. Joe, on the Badman farm, suffered a severe cut on his forehead Friday afternoon in an automobile collision on the Auburn–Newville road, at the Joe Hull Corners.

Mr. Rowe had his seven children with him in his Ford sedan and was going west on the state road, when a car driven by C. A. Husselman, a Butler music dealer, collided.

The Rowe car was turned around by the impact, slid into the ditch, striking a telephone pole, on the north-west corner of the road, and breaking it off up several feet.

Three of the Rowe children were slightly hurt. They are Ralph, Forest and Ellen. Mr. Rowe and the two boys were removed to the Garrett hospital by Dr. V. C. Brunson of Newville. The boys were able to return home after their injuries were dressed and tetanus antitoxin was administered. The father remained at the hospital for several days.

The third auto accident ,within a week, occurred about 1:30 Wednesday morning, when J. W. Warren, employed in the Auburn diner, and Oral Richmond, Newville, left the road just east of town in a Chevy coach, resulting in the girl suffering a broken nose, fractured shoulder and severe cut over eye, while Warren has a severe gash on head.

The particulars of the accident as we get it was that Warren had worked in the diner until 10 o'clock and then drove to Newville for his lady friend. They had driven to Auburn and then back to St. Joe and visited in the Chas. Sucher home. At 1:30 they started home and driving about 45 miles per hour, their car left the grade east of town and struck a pole, demolishing the car and injuring the couple. When Warren came to himself he heard the girl moaning a distance from the car, and after a time they made their way back to the Sucher home.

Dr. B. O. Shook was called and rendered first aid and E. R. Kinsey was called at 3:15 and took the couple to the Sanders hospital, where Oral underwent an Xray examination. Warren was able to be released.

The car figuring in the accident had been borrowed by Warren.

CELEBRATES HIS SIXTY-EIGHTH BIRTHDAY

During all the preparations that were made for a birthday dinner, not one thing was noticed out of the ordinary that would lead J. C. Hull to believe that he was due anything unusual.

But Sunday, when he came home from Sunday School, some of the guests had arrived and were stationed in the home, to surprise him, and cause him to remember that he had reached the 68th mile stone of life.

About the only thing that Mr. Hull had planned for the day's celebration was to have his birthday potatoes, which he has done for many years.

The guests of the day were Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Hull, of near Ashley, Mrs. Tressa Clouse and two daughters, Virginia and Jane, Miss Pearl Long, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Quance and children, Mrs. Vina Quance, daughter, Mary and son, Fred, of Auburn, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Quance and son, of Fort Wayne, Rev. B. W. Mayfield and family and ye editor and wife.

The day was spent in a social way and was enjoyed by all.

The following poem was written by B. W. Mayfield, after viewing the beautiful lilies beside the Hull residence on this day:

THE LILY

A lily grew so pure and white,
Beside the house, beneath my window light.

When I awoke at break of day
Dew's choicest gems on its petals lay.

The rising sun shined in its heart,
Revealing purity in its every part.

I loved its beauty. I loved its grace
And flush of shame spread to my face.

When in my thoughts I did compare
My heart, with its heart so white and fair.

God made me and the lily too,
But God gave me His will to do.

And I have failed in His light
And envy the purity of the lily so white.

NEW HOME BUREAU CLUB ENTERTAINED

The recently organized Home Bureau Club of Newville Township met at the home of Mrs. Blen Moore on Wednesday, June 18th. The following program was given: Opening song, "I Am Glad Mother Taught Me to Pray; prayer, Mrs. Priest; lesson topic, Ideal essentials of the Ideal Home; music in the home, Mrs. Lester Pierman; christianity in the home, Mrs. Priest; literature in the home, Mrs. R. COURT GIVES SNYDER THE MINIMUM FINE

Howard W. Mountz, one of the attorneys for the defense in the case of State vs. Albert B. Snyder, on trial in the DeKalb circuit court on a charge of bribery, flayed the arch-conspirators for their attempt to frame County Commissioner Nicholas Funk in an effort to coerce him to vote for the retention of Marion Clark as county highway superintendent. In his argument before the court Mr. Mountz deplored the fact that men who hold a public trust would betray the confidence of the public by entering into such a vicious conspiracy as was done in connection with the Snyder case.

Albert B. Snyder, of Indianapolis, was found guilty at 2:30 o'clock Saturday afternoon, and was fined $50.00 and costs, which is the minimum punishment that can be administered under the law.

Judge Clyde C. Carlin, of Angola, sitting as special judge to hear the case, reviewed the evidence as was presented and also the various motions that were filed as well as the objections and stated in open court that he did not believe that Mr. Snyder was guilty of any intent, but that technically he was guilty, and that he believed the minimum punishment was all that he should receive under the circumstances. Judge Carlin said:

"I want the people of DeKalb county to know that I do not think that Mr. Snyder came into the county wih any intention of seducing any county official. It was Mr Snyder, in my opinion, who was seduced. I think that Mr. Snyder was the unfortunate victim of the design for others. The conspirators themselves are the ones who ought to be punished."

Validity of Contract

The validity of the contract alleged to have been entered into between the North State Publishing Company and the County Commissioners of DeKalb county was attacked by the defendant's attorneys. A motion to quash the indictment at the beginning of the trial Thursday morning on the ground that the indictment was ambiguous. The court overruled the motion and the trial was under way during the forenoon when County Auditor Estel Dawson was placed on the witness stand. It developed that the contract entered into for office supplies was only a contract insofar as a commissioner's court record had been entered and that the contract itself had not been properly signed and executed, according to law. It was on this point that the attorneys for the defense claimed that no conviction could be made so long as there was no legal and binding contract in force. The court overruled the objection on the ground that testimony had been introduced showing that money had been paid to County Commissioner Nicholas Funk by Albert Snyder, the agent for the North State Publishing company, and that the act constituted a violation of the statutes, even though there was no specific per cent of the contract price made as a consideration of the bribe.

Wm. F. Schermerhorn, of Auburn, who was foreman of the grand jury that indicted Snyder, was a witness on Thursday afternoon. Mr. Schermerhorn testified that Albert Snyder apeared before the grand jury which convened March 12, at which time Snyder stated that he gave Mr. Funk $100 on December 4th last, in the store room between the treasurer's office and the auditor's office in the court house. Mr. Schermerhorn related the story as told by Mr. Snyder in which he told how he and Funk went into the room for a "conference" and that they talked a moment about that contract that had just been awarded to Snyder's company, and he shook hands with Funk and as he did so he placed $100 in five $20 bills into the hand of Mr. Funk and then walked out of the room. Snyder said that he represented the North State Publishing company, and he told his hard luck story about the sickness he had had in his family and that he had been out of work,

OBITUARY

Mintie Andress Northrup, daughter of David and Julia Andress, was born in Ashland County, Ohio, near Ashland, June 5, 1854, and died at St. Joe, Indiana, June 18, 1930, at the age of 76 years and 13 days.

December 4, 1874, the deceased was united in marriage with W. H. Northrup. To this union three children were born—two sons and one daughter. Earl DeForest the first born, died at the age of fourteen months. Thayer Andress, lived into manhood and died about one year ago. Mrs. W. L. Hamilton, the only daughter, in whose home the mother died.

The deceased came from Ashland to this community with her parents when she was only four months old, and located on a farm one mile east of Coburn's Corners Church, where she grew to womanhood. Early in life, April 15, 1867, she united with the Church of Christ at Coburn's Corners, and was baptized by Cyrus Alton who then was minister to that congregation. But later, after locating in St. Joe, she transferred her membership to the Church of Christ in that village. She was a faithful woman. In the home she filled the important positions of wife and mother with approved Christian grace and in the church she cheerfully discharged all her responsibilities and counted it a joy to serve.

Of the original Andress family two brothers survive. C. M. Andress, of Wilmington, California, and M. H. Andress, of St. Joe, Indiana.

The funeral services were held from the W. L. Hamilton home, east of St. Joe on Friday afternoon, with Rev. J. O. Rose and Rev. J. N. Scholes officiating. Burial was made in Alton cemetery.

Among the out-of-town relatives attending the funeral were: Mr. and Mrs. Byron Nye and niece, Bryan, Ohio; Mrs. Sherman Hart, Hicksville, Ohio; Mr. and Mrs. Sam Andress and Mr. and Mrs. John Brown, Auburn, Indiana; Mr. and Mrs. Ross Andress and son, Max, Elkhart, Indiana; Mrs. Lee Tustison and son, Keith, Defiance, Ohio, all of whom returned the same day, while Mrs. Dell Andress and son, Edward, Chicago, Illinois; Mr. Lyle Hoyt and son, Marian, Pullman, Michigan; Mr. Myron Hoyt and son, Ralph, Fennville, Michigan; Mr. and Mrs. Emery Bodfish, Mrs. Steve Marleau and son, James, Kibby, Michigan; Mrs. Ada Orr and Mrs. Ida Stevens, Kalamazoo, Michigan, remained until Sunday and visited with relatives.

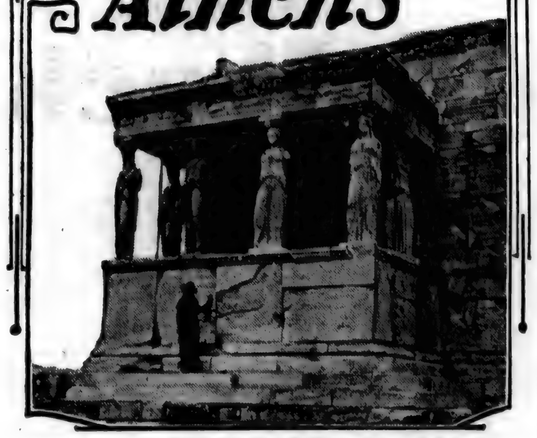
Glories of Athens



"Porch of Maidens," the Acropolis.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

RECALLING its century of modern independence and its thousands of years of glorious memories, Greece is celebrating its centennial. The republic of today has an area of approximately 49,000 square miles and a population of some 6,000,000. But the memories of past glories cling chiefly to the Plain of Attica, surrounded by its hills, with "Athens, the eye of Greece," as its center.

To every one sensitive to historical suggestion, to every one to whom beauty makes the supreme appeal, the first sight of this immortal city becomes the moment of a lifetime.

To the right rises Hymettus, famed now, as in ancient days, for the honey which the bees rifle from its flowers; to the left, and nearer, the island of Salamis, with its deathless memories; a bowshot away, Psyttalia, where Aristides and his band cut down the flower of Persian chivalry, after the naval battle of Salamis; still farther to the left, the ranges of Parnes, extending in a full, voluptuous curve toward the east.

As one looks closer, the city reveals itself more clearly and, out-topping all, the Acropolis, with the Parthenon as its diadem. In its still beauty, its majesty and its tenderness, the scene has a vague unreality.

It is a tiny country, this heart of Greece. The Attic plain stretches from the sea in an irregular oval from south to north; the entire province contains a bare 700 square miles.

Yet Attica "balances in the universe the glory of Imperial Rome." "Remember well, Quintius," writes Cicero to his friend, "that you have command over the Greeks, who have civilized all peoples, in teaching them gentleness and humanity, and to whom Rome owes the light she possesses." Cicero, of course, meant Attica, for it was in this little country that what we call the Greek genius was most effectively at work in the Fifth century B. C.

Moments of the Past.

When the visitor fares forth in Athens the past beckons to him. One of the first classic monuments his eyes are likely to rest upon is the Arch of Hadrian. This emperor, it will be recalled, was one of the principal benefactors of Athens in the value and character of his gifts. These embraced a water supply, a reservoir which is in use today, a library, and perhaps the Temple to Olympian Zeus. He also built the new city beyond the old one, and the arch marked the dividing line between the Greek and Roman towns.

Passing through the arch and turning to the right, one enters the precincts of the Temple of Zeus. The temple, like the buildings on the Acropolis, is of Pentelic marble, to which time has given an exquisite golden brown color, especially on the side which faces the sea. Two of the columns stand detached like sentinels and by a happy accident close the three-mile tangent formed by the Syngros avenue, which links up modern Athens with its little seaside resort, Phaleron.

One can trace his steps through the Arch of Hadrian by a narrow street known as the Street of Lysicrates which is probably the site of the ancient Street of the Tripods.

In the age of Pericles, apart from the athletic contests which took place at the Olympic and other games, there were contests in oratory, in poetry, and in music. At Athens the victor in one of these games was given a brass tripod, with the privilege of erecting a pedestal on which to place it, somewhere in the city.

At the end of the little street stands, in almost pristine loveliness, perhaps the only surviving monument of this character. It is the exquisite little structure—the oldest extant—erected by an Athenian, Lysicrates, on which to place the tripod awarded him as the organizer of a choir of young men which won a prize in vocal music in one of the games in the Fourth century B. C.

Theater of Dionysus.

This little structure was built into a convent in medieval times and was thus preserved from destruction. The convent was standing in Byron's day and he was a guest there in 1811; it was not until some years later that the monument was restored at the expense of the French government.

It is but a stone's throw from the Monument of Lysicrates to the Theater of Dionysus—of Bacchus, to give it its Roman name.

Like most Greek theaters, the tiers of seats are built into the hillside, while its arrangement is such that the spectators viewing the actors had in the distance the sea; so that as tragedy, "in specter'd pall, came sweeping by," there was ever present to the eye an expanse of land and water to heighten the effect produced by the action of the play.

And what names this place calls up—Aeschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, Aristophanes—the long roll of the great ones of Greece!

Leaving the theater, one walks to the inevitable goal, passing on the right the precincts of Aesculapius and various remains, including the charming Odeion built by Herod of Attica, another Roman benefactor, of the Second century, A. D., and on to the iron gates which mark the lower precincts of the Acropolis. Passing through these and walking up the long incline, one comes to a turning on the right and sees ahead the gates, or Propylaea, of the Acropolis.

High up on the right is the little Temple of the Wingless Victory, while a corner of the Parthenon can be described over the retaining wall. A steep stairway which leads from the outer gate of the Propylaea to the upper level must be climbed before one reaches the platform on which is the Victory temple.

Perfection of the Victory Temple.

The view outward from this platform is marvelous, but the shrine compels attention. Nothing can exceed in delicacy and charm this exquisite little structure. Four Ionic columns, each some 13 feet in height, support the architrave, but so perfect are their proportions that it is only when standing beside them that one realizes that they are twice the height of a tall man.

This diminutive, yet perfect edifice was demolished by the Turks in order to build a bastion, and was later reconstructed with the fragments of the original building.

Nearby is the spot from which the aged King Aegeus took his stand to catch the first beam glittering on the sail of the returning ship in which his son Theseus had sailed to Crete to kill the Minotaur.

Inside the temple are spots to which traditions cling. In the Treasure house, at the west end, it is said was stored the booty taken at Salamis, which included Xerxes' great golden throne.

The portico commands a superb view of the Saronic gulf; at every turn names familiar as household words came to the observer's lips—Salamis, the Bay of Eleusis, the dome-like rock of Acrocorinth, Aegina, and in the distance the soft line of hills marking the Peloponnesus.

Porch of the Maidens.

Turn again and you will face the Porch of Maidens—the Caryatids. These are too familiar to everyone to require any description and elaboration, but, as with other Greek sculptures, are admired whole-heartedly. The perfection of the draperies, the radiant youth animating the figures, the dressing of the hair, massed to give added strength to the neck, are a few of the elements of loveliness. Despite the latter device, however, in later times it has been found necessary to make a sort of iron frame on which to support the weight of the roof.

A dozen paces from the Erechtheum, whose portico stands today in almost untarnished beauty, are the walls built by Themistocles after the destruction of the first temple by the Persians in 480 B. C. In it were used a number of the drums of the ancient columns.

Immediately below these walls lies a little hill which is pointed out as the Areopagus, or Hill of Mars. Physically, the place is of little interest. There is a short flight of steps cut in the rock, and at the top are the sites of ancient altars.

The ancient Court of the Areopagus, consisting of venerable and eminent Athenian citizens, held its sittings on this hill, and it is usually assumed that it was from here that St. Paul, the future captive of Imperial Rome, in A. D. 54 spoke to Athenian skeptics with a reference to an altar "To the Unknown God."

The SANDMAN STORY

ABOUT THE LAZY COWS

"I FEEL so lazy," said Mrs. Cow. "Moo, moo, I don't want to do a thing.

"And the finest part about being a cow is that when one feels lazy one doesn't have to make a great effort.

"I've heard the members of the farmer's family talking about what they had to do at times when they didn't feel like doing anything.

"I have heard them say that they had to do this and that when they didn't feel like doing anything.

"Now when I feel that way I can stay quiet.

"To be sure I have to go up to the pasture in the morning after milking, and come down again at night.

"I Don't Want to Do a Thing," Said Mrs. Cow.

"But otherwise my days are very free of duties.

"I feel so lazy now, and I don't have to do a thing.

"I can just lie in this meadow and feel the warmth of the sunshine, and yet not too much of the sunshine, for the shade of the tree just by me is so pleasant, and such a help.

"I don't have to do chores, and I'm not going to do chores.

"I don't have to go to the village to shop and I'm not going to the village.

"I don't have to make beds, and I'm not going to make beds.

"I don't have to clean my shoes, and I'm not going to clean any shoes.

"I don't sleep in a bed and I don't wear shoes.

"I don't have to wash my hair. I don't have to shell peas.

"I don't have to weed the garden, and I don't have to water the flowers.

"I wouldn't mind that so much, but when one is lazy it is lovely not to have to do a single thing!

"I don't have to brush off the front steps nor the back piazza.

"I don't have to dust the parlor and I don't have to do any 'upstairs cleaning.'

"I don't have to do those things, and I'm not going to do those things.

"If a person didn't do what a person should do, she would be considered selfish, and would be selfish, as she'd only be making others do her work for her.

"But I'm not even considered selfish when I don't do these things.

"Of course it helps not to know how, and to be awkward about things.

"Years and years and years ago old Granny Cow said:

"'Never learn to do too much, or you'll have to do too much. Always be awkward and clumsy, and you won't be asked to help.

"'It's the capable creature who does things quickly and neatly and well, who is called upon to do things.

"'Be lazy, and don't learn too much.'

"Cows have always followed that advice.

"Now I feel lazy and I shan't do anything but lie in the meadow and chew a little and rest and have a lovely time of idleness.

"I don't have to hoe around the beans. I don't have to put sticks around the tomato vines.

"I don't have to thin out the lettuce and pick it just where it is thickest, and then wash all the dirt off it.

"I don't have to put fresh water in the flowers in the house. I don't have to wash the vases which have had flowers in them too long.

"I don't have to bring in kindlings to give the kitchen stove a fresh start.

"I don't have to do anything.

"I'm a lucky, lazy cow."

"We're all lucky, lazy cows," the others said as they looked at Mrs. Cow.

"Yes, all lucky, lazy cows," Mrs. Cow repeated. "Moo, moo, it is true."

"Moo, moo," said the other cows, "it is true. Quite true, quite true, moo, moo."

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

NEW GARMENTS FOR SUNDAY

A SUPERSTITION found in New England and some other sections of the country, as well as in Canada, is that if you wear a garment for the first time on Sunday you will have another one before that one is worn out. Sun-worship is clearly at the base of this superstition. The new garment, by being first worn on Sunday, is dedicated to the sun-god just as the new-born child was exposed to the sun's rays on first being taken out of doors, or was first taken to the light on a Sunday.

Analogous superstitions based on sun-worship are common all over the world. The sun was to the ancients the great giver of life and light and its rays imparted power, permanence and magical qualities. The whole history and theory of sun-worship cannot be gone into here, but the idea that a new garment worn for the first time upon the day dedicated to the sun should acquire special qualities is in perfect accord with the principles which animated the sun cult. A garment so dedicated would last longer than another; also the sun caused the crops to multiply and why not garments? Both these things would insure another garment before the sun-dedicated garment should wear out. There is also in the superstition under consideration a suggestion of the new garments which among some sun-worshiping peoples the priests used to don when they sacrificed to the sun-god.

Through a Woman's Eyes

By Jean Newton

"LEAVE IMMEDIATELY!"

A JUGOSLAV proverb says: "Speak the truth but leave immediately after!"

That sounds almost like American efficiency. And the most veracious-minded person must admit that there are certain truths, which the telling over, will prove it is expedient to leave "immediately after!"

After telling a woman the truth about how old she looks, for instance.

After telling certain people the truth about their spoiled "little angel" children.

After telling many of the men you meet the truth about how their conversation strikes you.

After telling a fat, middle-aged Lothario the truth about his dancing.

After telling most people who want to write what you really think about their stuff.

After telling some hostesses the truth about their parties.

After telling some "fashionable" women how their clothes really look.

After telling certain authors or artists the truth about how their product impresses you.

After telling the amateur entertainer the truth about what her singing does to you.

After telling some of your relatives the truth about their dispositions.

After telling your husband or wife what you're thinking about 50 per cent of the time.

Dear Editor:

HERE'S what I just learned about cotton, from a trip to Missouri, Arkansas and Tennessee. It grows on bushes, has a pretty flower, and you get a cent a pound for picking it. That means a lot of motions if you're going to earn $2.50 a day.

A bale weighs 500 pounds and is worth maybe 20 cents a pound. Also there's $16 worth of cottonseed sieved out of each bale. By and by that becomes soap or boarding-house butter.

The cotton gin gets $7 a bale for getting the cotton ready for market.

When cotton is to be exported, they re-bale it in a compress, making it about a third as high. By that time the cotton feels the way I do in the subway during rush hours.—Fred Barton.

For Meditation

By LEONARD A. BARRETT

DOES IT SELL?

IN HIS book, "Dollars Only," Edward W. Bok records the following conversation between father and son: "Does it sell?" said a merchant to his son, in a lesson in merchandising. "That's the only point there is; that is the acid test." "But suppose it isn't well made, and it won't stand up?" asked the son. "The buyer buys again, and that keeps up the market," was the reply. "Shouldn't an article, however, be made the best it can be made?" persisted the son. "So far as its cost will allow and there is a market for it. But the final test is, does it sell? If it does, that ends it."

L. A. Barrett.

Which was right? Was the father correctly instructing his son about fundamentals, which lead to permanent success, or was the son right in his earnest replies to his father? The father's argument doubtless is a very popular belief. The end justifies the means. Make money, no matter how, just so you make it. If you sell an article, that ends it. But does it? That is the question.

Any person who reads carefully into the successful records of those who have attained their ideals will be convinced that the ideal was achieved by something else than mere force, persuasion, or misrepresentation of facts. You can fool the public part of the time but you cannot fool all the public all the time. The day of reckoning finally arrives when a man must not only give an account of how he sold his merchandise but what kind of merchandise he sold. That account he gives to himself in that hour when trade falls off or when confidence once imposed in him is seriously questioned. The reason why he can no longer sell his goods is because his integrity is in question. When once trust or confidence has broken down, ruin and failure are the inevitable result. A bank faces serious situations when a run has begun upon it. Everybody wants his cash and the bank must produce it or close its doors. The run on the bank was caused by a lack of confidence. The depositors felt their money was no longer safe. The most valuable asset a bank has is not its balance sheets but its integrity. It does make a difference what you have to sell. You not only sell the article but you sell yourself at the same time. The son asked the most important question in modern day merchandising—"But suppose it isn't well made, and it won't stand up?"

A FAMILY DOCTOR'S LAXATIVE IS BEST

Your health is too important! You cannot afford to experiment with your delicate bowels when coated tongue, bad breath, headache, gas, nausea, feverishness, lack of appetite, no energy, etc., warn of constipation. This applies not only to grown people, but more particularly to children. That's why a family doctor's laxative is always the safe choice.

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is prepared today under strict laboratory supervision from fresh laxative herbs and other pure ingredients, and exactly according to Dr. Caldwell's original prescription.

Today, millions of families rely on Dr. Caldwell's judgment in the selection of their laxative. For Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, in bottles ready for use, sold in all drug-stores, is now the largest selling laxative in the world!

An "ambrotype" is a picture taken on a plate of prepared glass, in which the lights are represented in silver and the shades are produced by a dark background visible through the unsilvered portions of the glass. The ambrotype was invented by James Ambrose Cuttin, and used during the transition period between daguerreotypes and photographs.

SHEER HATS WITH SHEER FROCKS; FOR FORMAL AFTERNOON WEAR

IT IS the fashion for ever so sheer frocks to company with hats as sheer as their own sheerness. Thus the summer mode is presenting a picture with an illusive and intangible beauty about it—a sort of will-o'-the-wisp effect which is most beguiling.

Many of the new hats are that transparent one is impelled to look a second time to see whether a brim is really a brim or merely a halo of something or other that is lovely framing the face to a point of joyous enchantment.

Competition is keen between just such flattering openwork straw hats as the one topping the pretty chiffon frock in the picture, and the huge transparent hair capelines which are so entrancing, both because of their exquisite colors and their picturesque "lines."

The charming lacy straw here shown is yellow au naturelle, tuning in as it does with the yellow and brown which combines in the chiffon print of the frock. A happy combination, indeed.

Brown is a color featured throughout the summer mode. The fashion-minded are wearing hats brown in tone—hair or malines transparencies with dressy frocks or brown linenlike straws with informal and sports costumes. Accent is also placed on white kid shoes which are trimmed with brown.

Speaking of the sheerness of things for fabrics especially, sheer is the word. One of the outcomes of this flair for thin, transparent weaves is the revival of dotted swiss. Of the quaint swisses now in vogue, the most flattering compliment that can be paid them is to declare that they are as pretty as ever, and prettier. Organdie also is staging a successful "comeback"; likewise the all-together lovely batiste makes its reappearance in exquisite embroidered effects; cotton nets, too, and chiffons, of course. Frocks made very simply of monotone pastel chiffon is the latest "love" of the ingenue. These beruffled dresses (no trimming whatever except their ruffle fluffles) are flitting about in the shot-with-silver moire, the sleeveless blouse being of matching moire—a most unusual and decidedly lovely costume for evening or formal afternoon wear. A glittering rhinestone buckle fastens the narrow belt.

One of the outcomes of this new use for lace is the pleated skirt of allover neat-patterned lace in pastel color or white. The hemline is usually picoted, thus adding to its daintiness. Little frilly net or chiffon blouses or those of lace in contrasting colors are worn with these smart lace skirts. The effect is charming and summery. With a bolero or jacket added the ensemble idea finds happy expression.

Another unique employment of lace is for the costume slip, over which fashionists are posing frocks of sheerest nets, chiffons or organdies. The entire slip is of the allover lace, the patterning of which shows through.

The vogue for lace has reached the point that with her lace frock, milady is wearing both hat and gloves, in the form of quaint mitts, and even her slippers are fashioned of lace.

The lace dress which has a yoke of contrasting lace adds its prettiness to the summer scene. Perhaps the favorite in this collection is the black lace gown with its yoke either in flesh, white or cream. However, very effective are lace schemes, yoke brown, navy, gray or beige frocks with a sheerest of flesh tint, or white laces.

Now that fans are again making their appearance, the fan, all of lace, is counted among those most fashionable. And the new lace shawls—simply squares of lace with double hem of chiffon all around—they are lovely.

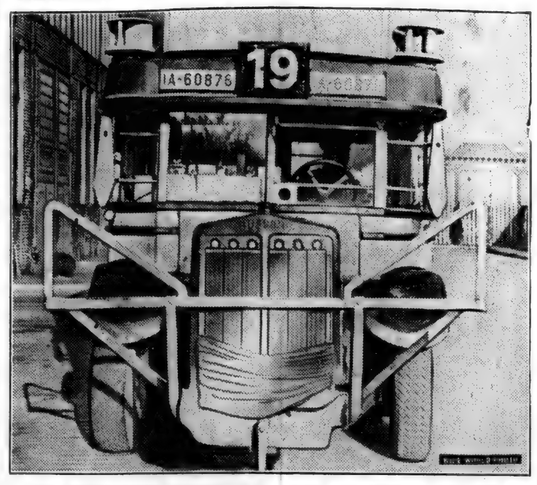
NEW TYPE OF FENDER APPEARS IN BERLIN



The Berlin Traffic company is at present experimenting with this new type of fender which is here shown on a Berlin bus. The new fenders are expected to prove a great help and guide to drivers in enabling them to judge their distance in narrow lanes of cars and in driving in small quarters.

BILL, THE BUS DRIVER SAYS

"It's safe to wait till others pass,
There ain't no doubt about it.
Tell that rule to a drivin' fool;
Don't whisper it, but shout it."

(By MARCUS A. DOW.)

A joint is a place where two streets join, intersect or cross and are mostly gamblin' joints where reckless drivin' fools risk their lives.

A laundry delivery bus was bowlin' merrily along a street in Chicago about a year ago when I was there spendin' a vacation and heap plenty dough, and the driver had the right-of-way. That is, he thought he had the right-of-way (right-of-way stuff is mostly the bunk) at this particular joint with houses built right up to the sidewalk line on all four corners, but a five-ton coal truck on the side street quickly changed his right-of-way theory.

Shirts and nighties were scattered half a block in each direction and the laundry driver was taken to a hospital where they built plaster casts around his legs to hold them together. He suffered nothin' worse than a double splintered fracture of both legs that crippled him for keeps, and that's nothin' to give three rousin' cheers about.

When a railway engineer runs a locomotive in a yard where there are no block signals he has a rule, "Be prepared to stop within your range of vision." A simple rule and a good one for drivin' fools to learn. If the distance from a point just in front of your car to a buildin' on a corner is 14 feet, that's your range of vision. Then you should be prepared to stop in 14 feet.

Dependin' too much on the other guy and poor judgment as to what is a safe speed are often causes of collisions at joints. You think 20 m.p.h. is a safe speed, but then you are going 30 feet per second. Multiply your speedometer speed by one and a half and you get the number of feet you travel per second. See if you can stop in two seconds! And see how far you go before you stop. Also before a biff in the neck leaves your friends weepin' and sayin' "He was good guy, but so careless."

Slow down as you approach intersections because they're dangerous gamblin' joints where human lives are lost on the turn of a set of wheels if luck goes against you.

Poor Highways Found to Be Rather Expensive

Based on an annual mileage of 11,000, this year's motoring will cost the car owner who drives on poor roads $226.60 more than the expenditures of motorists who drive the same distance on high-type roads, according to the touring department of the Detroit Automobile club.

This wide difference in the cost of motoring is calculated from figures furnished the motor club by the highway education board. The board based its findings on the cost of operating an automobile of the average size.

"It costs an average of $.0206 per mile more to drive a car on a bad road than on a good highway," says a motor club statement. "While this sum may seem negligible, one year of driving 11,000 miles on poor roads will result in the additional cost already mentioned. It is a fact that the approximate tax upon each car owner for a system of adequate highways is, with respect to the country at large, in the neighborhood of one-tenth of the additional cost of driving over bad roads for one year.

"In approving any good roads programs motorists are therefore approving an investment that will annually bring them dividends 10 times the size of their original investment. It would be extremely difficult to conceive a manner in which money could be invested more profitably."

Discarded Auto Axle Is Made Into Handy Crane

In a small garage, where I had some work done on my car, a simple type of swinging crane was used for lifting motors to the workbench. The crane consisted of a front auto axle, one end of which was pivoted to the wall, and the other end braced by means of an overhead turnbuckle rod to permit adjustment. A specially made trolley, the construction of which is clearly indicated, was installed to ride on the axle, all the ridges being, of course, filed away. The pulley arrangement comprises two small rollers and two side plates, the latter being bolted together at three points, which makes it impossible for the trolley to come off the track. The block and tackle are hooked to the lowest bolt of the trolley.—Charles H. Willey, West Concord, N. H., in the Popular Mechanics Magazine.

Troubles of Automobiles Show Great Variations

A point seldom considered in the business of servicing automobiles is that the same kind of trouble is not equally as serious for all makes. That a friend is inconvenienced by something that goes wrong with his car is no reason why another one need take the same sort of trouble so seriously.

This is neatly illustrated in the case of one make of car which will not start if an intake valve sticks open. Most other cars can be started despite such trouble.

If a rear axle breaks with rear ends of a certain type the machine has to be jacked up and towed in as a wreck. With another type the wheels are free to turn despite the axle trouble, so that ordinary towing is sufficient.

Even a broken shock absorber on the earlier models of a recently introduced car interfere with steering, whereas on the average car no serious difficulties would be met.

AUTOMOBILE HINTS

When the steering suddenly becomes stiff try lubricating the king pin bushings and inflating the tires. It usually works.

Man Might With Profit Take Lesson From Dogs

If man took lessons from dogs, the world would be a better place, according to Frank Dole, sportsman and dog fancier, writing in Country Home.

"This," he says, "is not hero worship on my part, but I do believe that the sacrifices dogs make for men and the faith the dog places in his master are examples of the finest qualities, qualities which man might show in a greater degree to the benefit of everybody. But just as among millions of men there are comparatively few who could properly be described as heroes, so among the millions of dogs not a great many distinguish themselves above their fellows for heroism.

"It is true that a dog's devotion is seldom alienated by neglect, but to bring out the finest qualities in him he must be treated as a companion. Trust and companionship are the things that have produced the greatest of canine heroes."

Happy Woman Tells How She Lost 19 Pounds of Fat in 27 Days

During October a woman in Montana wrote—"My first bottle of Kruschen Salts lasted almost 4 weeks and during that time I lost 19 pounds of fat—Kruschen is all you claim for it—I feel better than I have for years."

Here's the recipe that banishes fat and brings into blossom all the natural attractiveness that every woman possesses.

Every morning take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen Salts in a glass of hot water before breakfast.

Be sure and do this every morning for "It's the little daily dose that takes off the fat."—Don't miss a morning. The Kruschen habit means that every particle of poisonous waste matter and harmful acids and gases are expelled from the system.

At the same time the stomach, liver kidneys and bowels are toned up and the pure, fresh blood containing Nature's six life-giving salts are carried to every organ, gland, nerve and fibre of the body and this is followed by "that Kruschen feeling" of energetic health and activity that is reflected in bright eyes, clear skin, cheerful vivacity and charming figure.

If you want to lose fat with speed get an 85c bottle of Kruschen Salts from any live druggist anywhere in America with the distinct understanding that you must be satisfied with results or money back.

It is conceded by a large and righteous per cent of the laity and minnstry of the land that the many Protestant divisions of the church are not so much an evil as it is an inconvenience. The difference of belief of the various denominations are of course confusing but the one great thing that is the matter with his land is not so much the differences in belief of even different religions and denominations but the failure to believe in the one you belong to.

Strange: We are living in the day of special training. The mind is trained to do great things, the hands are trained to dexterity in production, the ear is trained to produce harmony in music, the eye to forsee and fortell coming events, the mouth to lend encouragement to the down and outers, our feet to make foot prints on the honorable sands of time and then leave our nose go untrained to keep out of other peoples business. Taint fair.

"Cut out talk" Gen. Chas. G. Dawes said upon his return to the United States from his post as ambassador to England, on a brief visit. He had reference to the police talk in Chicago, his home, relative to law enforcement. Mr. Dawes has his underslung pipe in action when he said what the old home town needed was action against crime and less chatter. If all the municipalities and state and county organizations, had a few men like Dawes at their head, the good laws of the country wouldn't have to take the blame for all the crime there is in the country. Punk headed citizens and grafting officials are more the cause of some crimes than the laws prohibiting them.

SOOT AND DUST RAISE HEAT BILLS

Dirt in the Heating Plant Blamed for Fuel Waste.

There is a tremendous wastage of coal and fuel oil during the heating season, due to the fact that home owners do not keep their heating systems clean. Many heating plants are literally filled with soot and dust, and, according to the Holland Institute of Thermology of Holland, Mich., the dirty condition is responsible for unsatisfactory functioning of the heating system and consequent waste.

In substantiation of the foregoing, the institute quotes from a report by the United States Bureau of Standards to the effect that even a thin coat of soot, one-eighth inch, cuts down a plant's efficiency 28 per cent, and a quarter-inch of soot will result in a 48 per cent cut in operating efficiency.

This explains why difficulty was experienced by some home owners in keeping their homes warm in last winter's cold weather. The soot and dirt in the heating system interfered with delivery of heat when it was most needed.

There is only one remedy for a condition of this sort, and that is to subject the heating system, including the chimney, to a thorough cleaning before the next heating season starts. When soot and dirt are cleaned out, draft troubles may be eliminated, combustic is more thorough, more heat is extracted from the fuel burned, and the home is more satisfactorily heated at less expense.

Formerly this was a dirty, messy job. Now it is accomplished as easily as the vacuum cleaning of the interior of the home, and much the same way. Cleaning of heating plants is now done by means of a giant vacuum cleaner that comes to the job mounted on a motor truck. The cleaner is attached to various openings in the heating plant, including the chimney, and the powerful suction of the fan draws out the dirt and soot, forcing it into the bag for later disposal. The cost of a job of this sort is less than the price of a ton of coal, though many times that will be saved in the course of a year in eliminating fuel waste and cleaning expenses.

HEATING PLANTS VACUUM CLEANED

Soot and Dust Blown Into 40-Foot Dirt Bag.

Machinery has again come to the rescue of the home owner in the accomplishment of one of the most menial and disagreeable of jobs, one which has heretofore been a mussy, dirty and undesirable job, says the Holland Institute of Thermology of Holland, Mich., and that is the cleaning of the heating systems.

In lieu of a grimy sweep with brooms, brushes, ropes and shovels, neatly uniformed operators arrive at the job with the big mechanical cleaner mounted on a motor truck. The cleaner parts include a powerful suction fan, several lengths of flexible piping and a 40-foot dirt bag. The attendants put the giant suction cleaner in operation, and the powerful suction draws the soot and dust accumulations from every part of the heating system, blowing the dirt into the dirt bag.

Without muss, fuss or dust the heating system is thoroughly cleaned and ready to give more efficient heating service when fall brings the first touch of frost. Many vacuum cleaners of this type are in use throughout the country, but according to the Holland Institute of Thermology, to secure the best results it is advisable to engage one equipped with a high powered motor and suction fan.

JINX IS BROKEN IN ELEVEN INNING GAME

The St. Joe Independents crossed bats with the Wayne Independents Sunday and came out on the long end of a 6–5 score.

The early part of the game brought forth some errors which the fans promptly answered with the old call of pack and needless to say the wolves were out for the kill.

The score was 5–2 in favor of Fort Wayne when the locals came to bat in the ninth. Coupled with an error and three hits the locals tied the score at 5 all.

Teh tenth inning gave two hits but failed to score and the score still tied at 5.

Three consecutive hits in the eleventh was enough to score and another hair raising, hair pulling ball game was over—and won.

Heavy hitting was in vouge, the locals getting 15 hits while the Wayne Independents collected 9.

Blair struck out seven while Daseler struck out four.

The locals got a "break" in the ninth on an error which happens to be the first break of the season and which they justly deserved.

Anyway, St. Joe proved that they had the punch and we expect them to keep it up and use it.

Sunday, June 29, the Hart, Shaffner and Marx team will be here to offer competition. This game features "Ladies Day," when all efforts will be dedicated to the fair ones and the price of admission for ladies will be missing.

Batteries for next Sunday's game will be Blair and Sapp for St. Joe; Kestner and Blaker for Hart, Shaffner and Marx.

Word has just been received from the Entomology Department of Purdue University that the second brood of Codling Moth will be ready to enter fruit in this vicinity from July 11th to 13th. In order to protect your fruit from worms you should have your first cover spray consisting of 1½ pounds of Arsenate of Lead with 50 gallons of water. If bitter rot is present it would be advisable to use the usual Fungicides. In case more information is desired call at the County Agent's office for Purdue Circular No. 151, The Codling Moth in Indiana.

ALLOTMENT OF PLATES FOR DEKALB COUNTY

By a careful estimate made by Otto G. Fifield, Secretary of State, there will be sent to DeKalb County for 1931, 6,000 passenger automobile license plates and 1,000 truck plates, there being a few more than a million plates for the entire state, in addition to 75,000 chauffuer badges. To give relief to the congestion of license applications for the first part of the year, licenses will be issued from all stations early in December.

There is the greatest activity in the office of the Secretary of State in preparation for the automobile business for 1931, license plates now being manufactured and distributed throughout the state.

The public is little aware of the time, labor and preparation required for prompt and efficient service and, Otto G. Fifield, insists that his corps of employees shall exert every effort to be fully prepared to promptly meet every demand made upon the department.

The 1931 automobile license plates are now being manufactured at the factory at Michigan City and distribution to the 122 stations in the state is now going on and will continue until every county in the state is supplied. In making the distribution an estimate must be made of the number of plates required and many problems must be solved before this can be done. It is estimated that about 35,000 cars will be junked during the year, in addition to a natural increase in the number of cars sold. Owing to the increased construction of mileage of state paved roads an increased demand is created for more cars and more automobile licenses will be issued in 1931 than ever before in Indiana.

Mr. Fifield anticipates an increased business for 1931 and is preparing to meet every emergency.

INCREASE PENSION FOR CIVIL WAR VETERANS

Washington, D. C., June, 21.—Pension increases affecting Civil War veterans in Indiana will go into effect July 4, following recent action by President Hoover in signing the bill passed by congress this session.

Indiana veterans now drawing $65 a month from the U. S. Pension Bureau will receive an automatic increase to $75 a month when the bill becomes effective, and those drawing $72 and $90 a month will be automatically increased to $100.

The Pensions Bureau today could not estimate the number of veterans now in Indiana, officials explaining that the concentration of pension statistical data which occurred several years ago now makes it impossible to segregate state totals without making an exhaustive search of the files.

The bureau states, however, that a total of 59,945 veterans in all states, according to the latest figures, are in line for increases under the bill. These veterans have been drawing from $65 to $90 a month, total payments to them aggregating more than $57,000,000 last year. The bill which has just become law will increase the annual total by approximately $11,000,000 it is estimated, making the amount for next year approximately $68,000,000.

Explaining various features of the bill as it affects Indiana veterans Representative Nelson, Wisconsin, Chairman of the House Invalid Pensions committee, said today that veterans now receiving pensions would get raises automatically after July fourth, but that veterans who may become physically incapacitated after that date will be required to file applications with the bureau of pensions to obtain the increased rate.

Nelson said a deduction of $25 a month will be made during the actual period any veteran is a resident of a soldier's home.

He pointed out that the law also provides an increase in pension from $30 to $40 a month for widows of Civil War veterans who have reached the age of seventy. Under the existing law, he said, it is necessary for a veteran's widow to attain the age of 75 before becoming eligible for the $40 rate.

CARE OF HENS IN HOT WEATHER

(By Prof. John E. Ivey)

With the approach of summer and the rise of temperature, each of us gives a great deal of thought and special attention to make our home more comfortable, and we change our style of dress so that our bodies may not become depressed by the rising temperature.

If this is true with the human race, we should make the same preparation in making our birds comfortable for the summer. This can be readily done by paying special attention to the problem of ventilation in the poultry houses.

Beneath the perch poles, we find it advisable to place at least four 28x24 basement sashes for every 20 foot section of the house. These windows shold be removed in the summer time and placed on strips tacked on the supports under the dropping boards, ready for use in the fall of the year when cold weather approaches. This allows plenty of floor ventilation, insuring comfort for the birds during the summer months. Beneath the plate in the rear of the house, a 12-inch ventilator should be provided. This can be easily done by taking off the two last planks just beneath the plate and putting 1 inch mesh wire netting on the inside of the plate so that the birds will not roost in the opening. This will allow a current of air to pass over the tops of the birds and at the same time preventing them from being subjected to direct draft.

In the summer time it is desirable to maintain the proper body weight with just as little grain as possible. Most of the better poultrymen are able to use 1½ to 2 times as much mash in the summer time as they do grain.

Every effort possible should be put forth to control external and internal parasites. Very few flocks that I have visited this spring have been entirely free from parasites. It is impossible to measure the amount of damage done by these parasites in the summer time.

Wind is a Close Second to Fire

In destuction and damage to property, high winds are almost as culpable as fire. A wind need not be of tornado force to do serious damage; nor is wind damage a hazard peculiar to any section of the country. Exceedingly high and dangerous wind movements have occurred in almost every section of the country and history will undoubtedly repeat itself. Windstorm Insurance is very moderate in cost.

The Idle Stomach—Our Most Serious Unemployment Problem

By E. V. McCollum, Ph.D., Sc.D.

Author of "The Newer Knowledge of Nutrition," "Food, Nutrition and Health," etc., Professor of Bio-Chemistry, School of Hygiene and Public Health, Johns Hopkins University.

LIVING as we do nowadays on a diet consisting largely of concentrated and highly refined foods, many persons too often overlook the absolute need for a certain quantity of "indigestibles"—food that keeps the digestive tract healthfully at work and provides the excess bulk so necessary to promote well being.

It is a recognized law of Nature that the digestive tract of any creature is adapted to suit the kind of diet to which the species long has been accustomed. And in order to obtain a clear picture of the importance of roughage in the human dietary, it might be well for us to review briefly the three types of creatures—including man—that compose the animal kingdom.

First, there is the species known as herbivora, who subsist entirely upon food of vegetable origin. These have stomachs of enormous capacity, and intestines which are large enough to contain the great residues of indigestible matter which result from a diet of coarse herbage. The lining membranes of the stomach and intestines of herbivorous animals, too, are highly resistant to mechanical injury and tolerate without damage the friction of the coarse residues as they pass along the digestive tract.

E. V. McCollum

Flesh-Eating Animals

Next in the scale of animal species we find the carnivora, who restrict their food solely to the flesh of other animals. In this group we find that the digestive tract is of much smaller capacity, as a result, no doubt, of long adherence to food of exclusively animal origin. Meat, glandular organs and fat, we know, are highly concentrated foods; and even a small bulk suffices to provide ample nutrients for growth and the maintenance of weight, even when much of the food consumed is burned for the performance of work or the production of heat.

While the digestive tract in these flesh-eating animals functions satisfactorily without much indigestible material on which to work, it must be remembered that the carnivora, under natural conditions, take a great deal of exercise and that the residue from their food is quite smooth in texture. Even so, many of these animals—as the dog, cat, lion and tiger—eat much bone substance, which is changed by the strong acidity of the stomach to form insoluble and fairly bulky material of a mass favorable to the mechanical functioning of the intestine, and thus makes elimination possible at a rate which is consistent with health.

Coming now to man—the third type of species in the animal kingdom—we find that he is omnivorous. Except in the far North, where no vegetable food is available, human beings draw their nutriment from both plant and animal life. Nevertheless, man cannot eat very bulky vegetable food in any considerable quantity, because his digestive tract is of small capacity. Neither can he safely eat of the coarser vegetables, because the lining membranes of his stomach and intestines are too delicate to withstand the scraping of the coarser particles of indigestible matter without injury.

What Cooking Does

One way in which man has attempted, and with success, to eat safely the coarser root and leafy vegetables, is through softening and disintegrating the cellulose of those foods by cooking them. The cooking process not only decomposes some of their substances classed as cellulose, but makes the remainder of the food more digestible and thus averts the after distress of eating. When some of the smaller and fugitive tribes of American Indians were forced into localities in which game was scarce and food plants not abundant, they were compelled by circumstance to eat grass seed, acorns and other vegetable foods which are coarser than humans are accustomed to eat. They suffered greatly from indigestion, and doubtless injured their digestive tracts by taking cellulose which was too coarse and irritating. They had not less than a score of "grandmother" remedies for indigestion to attest these experiences.

Common knowledge tells us that indigestible things are dangerous if eaten freely: yet it is equally clear that our intestines do not function properly unless there is a certain amount of indigestible matter to distend them to the right degree, and to form a mass which is favorable for the muscular contractions of the intestine to move along with the peristaltic waves.

Between the extremes of having in the intestine too much and too coarse cellulose on the one hand, and too little indigestible bulky matter on the other, lies the happy medium which is favorable both to comfort and health. There are many kinds of cellulose in different vegetable products. It forms the framework and fibers of plants, the walls of vegetable cells and the coverings of seeds. In most of its forms, cellulose is insoluble in boiling water; and it is not acted upon by any of the digestive juices, though certain kinds of bacteria are capable of fermenting and digesting the cellulose of certain plants.

Bran is probably the form of cellulose which has been most discussed in connection with the improvement of intestinal hygiene through facilitating elimination. There is good reason for believing, however, that when bran is eaten exclusively for promoting intestinal hygiene, it generally is eaten too freely. If properly softened through cooking, and taken in amounts no greater than are afforded by eating the whole cereal as a breakfast food, it is undoubtedly an excellent source of cellulose.

What has been said of wheat bran and its benefits is even more particularly true of the cellulose of the rice kernel. Rice is the principal cereal grain in the dietary of more than half the human race. Those who have been brought up on a diet constantly containing rice like it better than any other cereal. We have, in America, long been accustomed to eating small amounts of rice occasionally, but we generally never have eaten it as freely as we have either wheat or corn.

Cellulose of Rice Softest

The cellulose of the corn kernel is considerably more difficult to digest and more irritating than the cellulose of either wheat or rice. Of the three, the cellulose of rice is the softest and smoothest; and for regulating the elimination of children, or of adults with delicate digestive systems, it is almost ideal as a source of bulky matter.

A few faddists doubtless eat too much of cellulose-rich foods, particularly green leafy vegetables. While we never should become extremists about any feature of the diet, it is a fact that the modern food regimen often is lacking in sufficient cellulose, and this matter of an idle stomach and digestive tract is one of the most serious unemployment problems that confronts the human race today.

Improved Uniform International Sunday School Lesson

(By REV. P. B. FITZWATER, D. D., Member of Faculty, Moody Bible Institute of Chicago.)

(©, 1930, Western Newspaper Union.)

REVIEW: THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM CONTINUED

GOLDEN TEXT—Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Making Jesus Known.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Believing in Jesus.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—What Shall I do with Jesus?

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Meaning of Christian Discipleship.

The plan of review must always be determined by the teacher in the light of the grade of the school and the aptitudes of the pupils. For senior and adult classes the best method will be to recall that all the lessons of the quarter are from the book of Matthew, which has as its theme Jesus Christ, the Messianic King, and His Kingdom, and to present each lesson in its relation to this central purpose. The lessons have a threefold unity, namely, one book, one theme, one person.

Lesson for April 6. To prepare the disciples for the dark hour of the cross, Jesus sought to lead them to a clear apprehension of His purpose and mission. After Peter's confession of Him as the Messiah, Jesus showed to the disciples that He must come into His place of triumph through the tragedy of the cross.

Lesson for April 13. The greatest in the kingdom are those who possess childlike humility. The condition of entrance into the kingdom is true conversion, or birth from above.

Lesson for April 20. In this lesson we have divine instruction as to behavior in case of ill-treatment. Those who are Christlike shall suffer persecution. Those who have entered the kingdom by birth from above—those who have received forgiveness from God—will forgive their fellows.

Lesson for April 27. Riches are deceitful. Possessors thereof are prone to put their trust in them. It is most difficult for those who are rich to give place to spiritual things.

Lesson for May 4. Those who would be greatest in the kingdom should, like Christ the King, take the place of self-abasement. In love, Christ gave Himself for others. He substituted "the greatness of love for the love of greatness."

Lesson for May 11. To the nation which rejected Jesus as King and was endeavoring to kill Him, at the appointed time, in the councils of God, He officially presented Himself as King, in fulfillment of prophecy.

Lesson for May 18. Under the figure of a marriage, Jesus set forth the privileges and benefits of the kingdom. He used marriage, the highest ideal of love and friendship known to man, to show the benefits of the kingdom.

Lesson for May 25. In the Olivet discourse Jesus outlined the events in the world to take place in the interval between His crucifixion and His second coming. The parable of the ten virgins shows the right behavior of believers in this present age in view of the coming of the Lord.

Lesson for June 1. By talents is meant whatever faculties and powers one possesses as God's gifts, such as physical strength, reason, knowledge, speech, song, or money. All these should be employed so as to honor God who gave them. A reckoning time is coming when account shall be rendered for their use. This will be at Christ's second coming.

Lesson for June 8. Mary of Bethany, because of her keen apprehension, saw that the Lord's body would be broken and that His precious life would go out at a time when no one could lovingly minister to Him. She therefore anointed Him as against that dread day. When the disciples criticised her act, she was defended by Jesus.

Lesson for June 15.—Jesus did not die as a martyr or as an example, but to make an atonement for man's sin. The supreme value of the lessons for the quarter centers in the cross. Teachers, it is not a matter of getting your children to learn the lessons of a great teacher, but to induce them to have faith in Christ's sacrificial death.

Lesson for June 22. The resurrection of Jesus demonstrated His Messiahship and deity. The command of Jesus to preach the gospel in all the world is backed by His resurrection power.

The Oil of Joy

Christianity wants nothing so much in the world as sunny people, and the old are hungrier for love than for bread, and the oil of joy is very cheap, and if you can help the poor on with the garment of praise, it will be better for them than blankets.—Henry Drummond.

A Moral Pivot

The Hindu professor of modern history in a South India college said to me: "My study of modern history has shown me that there is a Moral Pivot in the world today, and that the best life of both East and West is more and more revolving about that center—that Moral Pivoting is the person of Jesus Christ."—E. Stanley Jones.

Force of Character Necessary

The most brilliant qualities become useless when they are not sustained by force of character.—Segur.

"That would be useless," she said more coldly. He knew she was relieved to see Mary coming toward her. He sighed. So there must be a little more sailing under the skull and crossbones.

* * * * * * *

As the yacht neared its destination Hamner became less certain of his future. His efforts to stir Todd and Bob Unwin into active insubordination had not come to fruitage. His aim was to awaken a certain proper pride in the breast of the late Captain Hallett's nephew. Was he, an officer, to allow the vessel he should control by right, to be taken into New York by a murderous villian like Andrew Orme?

"They'll say," said Hamner, with resigned sadness, "that you was afraid of him; they won't believe it was caution. I'll say he was bigger and stronger and you was wise to wait. What's it matter if they do laugh at you a bit, sir?"

"Shut up," Crosby Todd said angrily. He resented these implications of cowardice. It happened that he was courageous and had long felt his inaction was unmanly. And it seemed that Bob, who had a spell off duty, expected him to betray more leaderlike qualities.

"What do you think we ought to do?" Bob asked.

Hamner sprang instantly into action.

"Seize him," he said; "there's three to one and he don't suspect a thing. Tie him up, the swine, and then wireless for help. That'll put us in good. It's my belief," the tempter went on, "that him and Metzger plan to get away. What's to stop them going overboard just after we get through the Bridge and escaping or lowering a boat in the dark?"

"We mustn't let him get away from the police," Todd said, wavering, "and yet it seems hardly playing the game to get him now?"

"If you're afraid, just say so." Hamner's manner was less polite. "But don't expect me to want to give a bloody murderer fair play same as I'd give you." A happy thought struck him. "If the judge says to you, 'Why didn't you do what Albert Hamner said?' what'll you answer? I'll have to tell him everything."

* * * * * * *

At the wheel Bettipgton was fighting against the desire to sleep. Never had he gone so long with so little rest. There was a great deal of shipping and he had not much confidence in Todd's seamanship.

The dawn was breaking chill and gray when he passed Fort Hancock. It was there that the three flung themselves upon him. There was little opportunity to struggle. Hamner brought down a belaying pin on his head with enough force to render him unconscious. He was awakened by the harsh spitting of the wireless. He realized that the Albatross was anchored. He was lying on the floor of the wheelhouse. He was bound and gagged as neatly as ever Metzger and Pereira had been. The pain in his side was now very severe. And with it all was a racking headache.

Mrs. Radway came on deck at about eight o'clock. She thought that Crosby Todd and Bob looked at her with a certain degree of embarrassment. And Hamner, the ill-omened, was with them.

"The New York Yacht club is sending out some one to take us in," Todd told her. "They ought to be here any minute now."

"I thought the doctor capable of that," she said, frowning.

"He's capable of anything," Hamner cried. "You don't know what we've done for you, ma'am."

"What does the man mean?" she asked of Todd.

"I had to seize the ship," he said. There was no question of evading what he had done or declining responsibility. "We found that Orme had planned to escape and we are holding him for the police. You remember he wouldn't let me use the wireless? That was because he didn't want to be caught. It's easier for a crook to escape in New York than it would be in Limon."

"Where is the doctor?" Mrs. Radway asked.

She followed them to the bridge. The attack had been made in the dawn, and Todd had no idea that Hamner's blow had been so severe or that so much blood had flowed from the wound. He tried to prevent Mrs. Radway from seeing the man. She knelt down at his side and removed the gag.

"Are you very much hurt?" she asked. Her heart was beating wildly. After all, they had betrayed him. There were tears in his eyes. She could see that he did not dissociate her from those who had made the assault.

"They carried out your orders most successfully," he said, and turned his aching head away.

The shrill sound of a siren stirred Todd to action.

"It's the Yacht club launch," he cried.

Mrs. Radway bent over Bettington again. None else was near.

"I suppose you can never, never believe it," she whispered, "but I had no hand in this. I shall always feel ashamed when I think of it."

When he made no answer she went out on deck. Perhaps what had happened was fated, that hour to which he had been drawing near for a lifetime.

Mary Unwin had seized her arm excitedly. How like youth, she thought, to forget its recent perils and present a serene front to the world.

"Look," Mary cried. "There's Dad."

Evelyn Radway looked down at the launch and saw that there were men in police uniform, too. Then she recognized the senior partner of the great firm which transacted her business. There was nothing she could do now for the injured man than commend him to Mr. Bigelow's care.

It seemed an interminable time before the police questions were answered and she was on the Yacht club launch with the Albatross lying astern. She had been glad to accept the opportunity to leave the yacht on the much faster launch.

CHAPTER XIII

Mr. Unwin Speaks His Mind

The Unwins were speedily to find what wealth and the desire to help them could do. Within twelve hours of meeting Evelyn Radway, their small flat had been abandoned and they were occupying six beautifully appointed rooms in a mansion, whose grounds ran down to the Hudson.

It was Unwin's mission to go to the Albatross and bring back a list of things Mrs. Radway wanted. On the night of his first visit to the yacht, he returned in a mood of horrified excitement.

"Do you remember a man named Hamner?" he asked.

"I shall never be able to forget him," his hostess answered. "Why?"

"A sailor they called Red Mike must have had some grudge against Hamner who, from all accounts, seemed a quiet, civil-spoken man. Mike got at him and jumped overboard with the poor fellow in his arms. The stream was running fast and they couldn't save them."

"Horrible," she exclaimed. "There must have been a curse on the ship. Death upon death."

"And there's another likely," Unwin went on, "the prize crook of them all, Dr. Andrew Orme. There's not much chance for him. Perhaps it's the better way. I should like to have seen him. The police think he was the brains of the whole thing, even the man you called Clements seems to have been less dangerous. They have Orme's record complete and hope to be able to fill in the details of the years they lost sight of him."

Unwin talked on, asking innumerable questions and getting ready replies from all but Mrs. Radway.

* * * * * * *

Less than forty miles distant there were grouped around the bedside of a man who was not expected to live, an inspector from headquarters, a police surgeon and an official stenographer.

"Now, Andy," the inspector begged, "be reasonable. Why go to your Maker with a lie on your conscience?"

The suspect held out his hands. The inspector did not know what he meant.

"Finger prints," said Bettington faintly; "you haven't verified them yet."

The inspector did not like to tell him he was rushed to the bedside in order to take his dying depositions. A dead man's hands were just as good evidence as those through which the blood coursed.

"I thought you told me he was all in," the inspector said to the surgeon. "You said you'd give him half an hour at the most."

"He's one of those obstinate cusses," said the surgeon. There was a certain admiration in his voice; he could not forget that here was a member of his own profession who had attained world-wide fame ere crime enmeshed him. "He's got the will to live," the surgeon added. "Why not humor him? He's crazy to be finger printed."

The inspector came to the bedside. It was not often he could grant a last favor so easily.

"All right, Andy," he grinned. "I'll do it."

An hour later the surgeon was wanted on the telephone.

"That bird ain't Andy Orme," said the inspector with a note of grievance in his voice. "His prints are absolutely new ones to us."

The surgeon found the unknown awake and in pain. The surgeon's look was not as friendly as it had been. He had been mistaking a person of probably no importance with the discoverer of the celebrated Orme method of cerebral surgery.

"You're not Andrew Orme," he asserted. There was irritation in his manner; he felt he had been fooled and the sensation was not pleasing.

"I keep on saying so," Bettington remarked, smiling grimly. "Now can I be allowed to sleep in peace?"

* * * * * * *

Mrs. Radway discovered in Unwin, a man whom she could trust because he was honest and devoted to her interests. A very great deal of business devolved upon him. For the first time in his working life he was happy. The Massachusetts Institute of Technology was to receive Bob, and Mary was to graduate from Smith before she married. Crosby had yet to win his way.

Usually the Unwins took their meals in their own suite, but very often they were invited to dine with Mrs. Radway.

The three of them—Mrs. Unwin was still unable to move—were invited to a dinner party, given by Evelyn Radway, when she learned that Todd was to leave for an appointment in Chicago, exactly one week after landing from the Albatross.

At seven, Mary heard her father's voice on the telephone. He said he should not be able to get to Peekskill until nine.

"Your voice sounds cross, Daddy," she said. "Are you angry with anyone?"

"Angry is too mild a term," he said, and hung up. Usually he called her by some pet name, but he was abrupt, different and incomprehensible.

When he came they were sitting around a wood fire in the large hall around which the house was built. Unwin was one of those kindly men given to effusive greetings when he knew his people. Tonight he bowed to them all coldly. Not even to Mrs. Radway did he unbend.

"Daddy," said Mary, plaintively, "you haven't spoken to poor Crosby yet. He's hurt."

"I have no doubt," said Unwin distinctly, "that a young man of his resourcefulness and intrepidity will recover from the shock."

Crosby Todd flushed. He had been told that his future father-in-law was of a kindly and affectionate disposition. Assuredly, the smileless, middle-aged gray gentleman on the rug before the fire was not running true to form.

"I'm afraid you have had a tiring day," Mrs. Radway remarked.

"One of the most miserable I have ever spent," he answered. "It is difficult to know just how to tell you about it."

Mary came to his side and slipped her arm through his. Very rarely had she seen her father in such a mood as this. Had he, she wondered, taken some dislike to Crosby? His tone seemed evidence of it. Essentially she was a peacemaker.

"Don't tell us now," she begged. In the morning this black mood would have passed.

Floyd Unwin took no notice of his daughter. He stood there meditating. The girl might not have existed.

"Very difficult," he repeated. "I suppose I had better commence by proclaiming my own inefficiencies. I have been an economic failure, Mrs. Radway. I have worked hard and there is nothing to show for it. A month or so ago I went to an old friend and asked financial aid from him. It was for my children's education I needed it. He refused me. I learned then something of the scorn success has for such as I."

"Don't Daddy," Mary begged. She saw that for some reason, unguessed by her, he was bent on crucifying himself publicly.

"Another man," he went on, unheeding, "a friend of equal standing in point of years, offered aid. It was not in his power to give it immediately. He set out to earn by his unquestioned skill the few thousand dollars I needed. It was for Bob and Mary he took this burden upon him. I remember that he said he would try and be a fairy godfather to them. Well, he failed."

Unwin fell into another fit of silent musing. When he spoke again it was of another subject. "I have just come from the bedside of a man who is dying." He looked toward Crosby Todd, sourly. "The man you and my son attacked, wounded and left for the police to drag to the Tombs. I commend your caution, Mr. Todd."

Evelyn Radway was glad that the dancing shadows from the open fire concealed her face.

"I don't understand you, Mr. Unwin," Crosby Todd stammered.

"Daddy, they had to do what they did," Mary told him earnestly.

"You waited," Unwin resumed, looking implacably at Todd, "until he was worn out from the sleeplessness he endured for you. You and my son took him at a moment when he was physically exhausted. You attacked him when he was suffering from three ribs broken in the fight with the man he killed. You inflicted such violence that the splintered ends of these fractured ribs penetrated the pleural sacs."

"We didn't know that," Bob cried. "We hadn't any idea he was hurt; he never let me know."

"You must be fair to them, Daddy," the girl insisted.

"I feel just as bitterly toward you and Mrs. Radway," he said. "You lent yourself to the betrayal. Isn't there anything that looks from the soul of an honest man to tell women, with their finer intuitional senses, that he is to be trusted?"

Evelyn Radway's voice had tears in it.

"How could we know?" she wailed.

"Madam," Unwin said coldly, "he told you. Many times he tried to convince you, but you would not listen. After that, I suppose, he was too proud. He told you all his real name. Can you deny that he claimed to be Howard Bettington?"

"But you went to Bettington's funeral just before we sailed," Bob reminded him. "You identified him."

"I do not want to spare myself," his father answered. "I identified the body of a man, whose face was disfigured, as Howard Bettington, because he wore Bettington's clothes, was living in Bettington's studio and had papers of Bettington's in his pockets. But I did not fail him as you did."

"What man was it whom you identified?" Evelyn Radway demanded, with a passionate eagerness.

"A name well known to you," he returned. "One Andrew Orme, forger and double murderer. This has been established by the finger prints."

"How did Mr. Bettington get aboard the Albatross?" Mrs. Radway still spoke from the enwrapping shadows.

"I told you that one of my friends offered help. That was Bettington. Although his reputation was wide he had not needed to sell his pictures, as many do, to live. For the sake of my children he determined to fill commissions long ago given him. He went off on his trip eagerly, like a boy seeking adventure. My G—d! What an adventure! In that great August storm which did such damage he was nearly drowned and took refuge in the hut of a fisherman who called himself Jonathan Gibbs. In reality he was Orme, who had lived there many years, having no friends and passing a solitary existence. When Bettington, in Orme's clothes, was forcibly taken aboard the yacht, Orme took Bettington's clothes and money and went to New York and met his death there, as you know." Unwin sighed heavily. "A double tragedy."

He related, as well as he could, the manner of Bettington's abduction. When it was clear he had nothing more to tell, Mrs. Radway arose and asked him to follow her into the library.

"You must take me to him," she said. For the first time he saw that she had been crying. Dully, he wondered why.

"I don't think it necessary," he told her. "He sent messages by me to you all. For some reason or another, he persists in thinking you were justified for what you did. I confess I do not understand why. It seems quixotic in the extreme."

"Mr. Unwin," she said, "I am going to see him. If you don't care to come, please give me the address."

"I'll take you," he said wearily. "I must speak with my wife for a few minutes first."

He joined Mrs. Radway in a quarter of an hour. She was waiting for him impatiently, but they were already on the steep hill leading into Croton before she spoke.

"You were right to feel bitterly toward me," she confessed. "I have always held that love should cast out all doubt, and yet, when the trial came, I was found wanting. I loved him and yet allowed all these seemingly inexplicable things which confused us, mixed identities and small jealousies, to blind me and build a wall of distrust which hid him from me. And now it is too late."

Unwin patted her hand with a gesture that was at once clumsy and affectionate. His anger had died down. Her grief moved him. He began to regret his bitterness.

"My dear," he said simply, "God is good and understands—and forgives. We do not yet know that it is too late."

That surgeon met them who had been disappointed in finding his patient was not the celebrated Andrew

"You Attacked Him When He Was Suffering From Three Ribs Broken in the Fight With the Man He Killed."

Orme. He gazed with marked interest at the beautiful woman he knew to be the many-millioned widow of Elgar Radway.

"May I see him?" she begged.

"These are not visiting hours," he reminded his visitors, "but I might stretch a point if it's important."

"It is the most important thing in my whole life," she said simply.

She stood for a few moments framed in the doorway of that bare and pallid room which had been the place of innumerable sorrows. In this sordid setting she seemed to the man on the cot ethereally beautiful, slender as the stem of a lily and filled with a divine compassion. In vain he tried to make some motion of welcome, but his body was immobile in plaster casts and his hands seemed too weak to respond to his will. His voice forsook him. He could only stare at her in wonder.

Then she came to the bedside and knelt down and took the strengthless hands and held them to her lips.

"Why have you come?" he asked, and dreaded to hear the answer. He dared not allow himself to feel the certainty of the happiness which had come to him at sight of her.

It was when she looked at him that he knew there would be no misunderstanding between them while life remained.

"I came to say good-by and ask you to forgive me if you could. But I see now there is going to be no good-by and you have forgiven me."

The bitterness of the waste years had gone from her. Over the man on the cot was stealing a new strength and peace. He experienced a sense of protection; he was assured of the return to health and the reality of happiness.

In the outer room the surgeon was discussing his creed with Floyd Unwin.

"When I told him who was waiting, I could see new life coming back. I claim to be a free-thinking materialist, but every now and then a miracle like this happens. . . . I suppose one might say that love is the supreme miracle. . . . But all the same," said the surgeon, "it upsets my calculations."

[THE END.]

World's Oldest Library Discovered in Syria

What is supposed to be the most ancient library in the world, consisting of documents written in the first alphabetic signs known to savants, was discovered in Syria by a French archeological expedition. Eighteen large and small tablets, engraved with letters that are neither hieroglyphics nor Assyrian cuneiform characters, but evidently parts of the first alphabet made of 26 and 27 signs, were found by a young Alsatian archeologist on the Syrian coast of the Mediterranean, at a place called Ras-Shamra, near Iatakieh (Ladikiya). The expedition had discovered there a necropolis, the 4,000-year-old ruins of a Phoenician palace and town, and numerous ancient vases, jars and statutes of great archeological and historical value. The opinion was put forward by the Academie that these ruins represented traces of an Aegian colony that existed on the Phoenician coast 2,000 years before the present era, and whose civilization was of the Mycenian period. Salomon Reinach, the famous French historian, who was present when the report was presented, declared that the discovery was a most extraordinary one, and that it would be of the greatest importance for the study of ancient history.

English Game Protection

In English law the term "ground game" applies to hares and rabbits which are subject to extinction by the occupants of lands to protect their crops from injury and loss. This removes these animals from the protection which, in the interest of the sporting classes, the English law throws about wild animals which are hunted for sport. Ordinarily the possession of land confers no right to kill or snare game found thereon, but it is not uncommon in England to provide in a lease for the keeping down of ground game.

Small Gold Coins

One dollar coins have not been minted for general circulation since 1889. Since that date some have been issued as memorial coins, the last being the Grant memorial coins, in 1922. The smallest current gold coin is the $2.50 gold piece.

Community Building

Township Play Centers New Recreational Idea

That part of the Michigan Thumb tributary to Port Huron has developed a new recreational idea. The people are organizing what they call "Township Playdays." Maybe the rest of Michigan will be interested to see what comes of it.

The township is the oldest, the simplest and most democratic political unit, but it seldom has served the purposes of a social group. The school district with its centrally located schoolhouse was more convenient.

But good roads and transportation are contracting big areas and little ones, and people more widely separated are coming to regard themselves as belonging to one neighborhood. Obviously if the Thumb folks succeed in getting together by townships for their "playdays," the very size of the gatherings will lend an atmosphere of success to the undertakings.

It is purposed to provide games and sports for all the people, young and old, big and little, men and women. And there are to be professional sport directors to teach the backward how to play and to inspire all with that spirit of co-operation which will enable them to play together.

There may be more to this thing than appears at a glance. It is a capital idea to play with.—Detroit News.

Disadvantage to Have Trees Too Near House

The proper placement of trees in regard to the house is a problem all by itself. No doubt there is something extremely cozy-looking in a house tucked immediately against a tree, but the overhanging branches tend to cut down the chimney draft, offer more fire hazard, in case of lightning, and in other ways prove a detriment.

Trees placed at least 20 feet from a house offer better background values, and throw even better shade. Their picturesque or "homey" effect is the one thing desired above all; to secure this, trees in front of a house ought to be to one side, rather than directly in front, in order to frame the house. Thus two trees, one to either side, offer the maximum effect, in the frontal approach.

Large trees to the rear give background effect to be secured in no other way. Even here the center of lawns are best left clear, and the trees kept to the sides, unless they are at the extreme back limits of the lot, where they preferably may be in the center.

Making House a Home

The house is the center of the little portion of the earth's surface we call home. To it lead the drives and paths; around it lie the lawns and gardens that mean so much to the hours of our recreation and delight. To make the surroundings a picture of harmony is to make the house truly a home. Does your front entrance, a most prominent picture, have that air of both welcome and dignity so much desired? Are those paths and drives bordered with evergreen hedges as well as your rose and perennial gardens? If so, you are fortunate indeed, but remember, no place should be considered complete until the patrimony of the evergreen tribe, the specimen box, is planted.—Exchange.

Little Town's Advantage

Contrasted with the clamor and commotion of the big cities, life along any "Main street" is better for anyone than living in the city. The changes in social life make amusement available to the "small town" resident. No one wants a steady diet of one thing, and the small community offers a variety that the "big city" cannot give.

Homes and Credit

There are two kinds of credit. One is constructive, the purchase that outlives the debt; the other is destructive, the purchase that is used before the debt is paid. Credit is becoming more and more a question of character rather than collateral. Permanency of the family, the fact that they own their own home, is one of the principal standards by which credit is measured.

Improvement Always Possible

Rational planning is good, even for the city or town that is not in process of marked development. Much can be done with existing conditions by way of improving traffic facilities, establishing order, eliminating unsightliness, providing beauty and adopting desirable regulation of signs, billboards, building and remodeling.

Marble for Outdoor Use

The desirability of marble for the garden does not end with its distinctive beauty . . . for its unusual weathering qualities, its ability to withstand extreme changes of temperature and its imperviousness to moisture make marble the most practical of materials for outdoor ornamentation.

Money Well Invested

Money spent in home modernization has a definite social value. This aspect must never be overlooked when considering this most important subject.

MICKIE SAYS—

Favorite Bible Passages of William T. Gardiner

Governor of Maine.

He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?—Micah 6:8.

Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets. —Matthew 7:12.

Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things.—Philippians 4:8.

Snyder Case

and now that he was engaged with the new company he wanted to make a showing and get some business, and that he had been told by Estel Dawson, county auditor, that he would have to fix things if he expected to get the business. Snyder told the grand jury that it was the first time that he had ever "slipped." He told the grand jury that Dawson had informed him that if he expected to get future business he had to give the money. Dawson also told him that it would be necessary for him to sweeten up the commissioners and that $100 would be necessary. Snyder told the grand jury that he asked Dawson how much money would be necessary to use and Dawson told him $100.

Snyder also told the grand jury how he met Funk the first time after the transaction, in January, when Funk met him at his room in the Auburn hotel and Funk gave the money back to him. That prior to this time he came back to Auburn and called at the auditor's office where a conversation took place and he left Auburn without seeing Funk, as he had been advised to do by the county attorney, and that he came back the second time when he met Mr. Funk.

Art Zimmerman, deputy county seriff, testified that he had secreted himself in the store room and hid back of some awnings that were in one corner of the room and there he waited for Snyder and Funk to enter the room and that he saw Snyder hand Funk some money. According to the testimony brought out at the trial Zimmerman had been called to hide himself in the room to see the money given to Funk, on the theory that some one knew that it was to take place at about the time Zimerman entered the room and placed himself in hiding.

The state rested its case Thursday evening and court adjourned until Saturday morning.

Then it was that a new angle developed when it was found that the county auditor had neglected to see that the required legal notice had been published that the county commissioners would receive bids for the county printing. The various newspaper publishers of the county were called in as witnesses and all of them testified that they had not published such a legal notice. It was on this question that the legality of the contract arose after the state had rested its case and the attorneys for the defense made a motion that the court find for the defendant. The motion was overruled and the defense placed Commissioner Funk on the stand. Mr. Funk testified that he had been a resident of the county for 26 years and that he was elected county commissioner in the fall of 1926 and was again elected in the fall of 1928. He said that he met Snyder for the first time on Dec. 4th last; that he had entered the men's rest room on the second floor of the court house, and that Auditor Dawson came to him and said he wanted him to meet Mr. Snyder, who represented the North State Publishing company. Dawson said Snyder was a nice fellow and represented a good company. Funk said he told Snyder that if his bid was the lowest he would get the contract. The bids were opened at 10 A. M. on Dec. 4th. There were four bidders for the contracts. Present at the time were Ed Kelham and Charles Potter, county commissioners, county assessor Chas. Miser and Auditor Estel Dawson, besides himself. Funk said that the bids were canvassed and that Dawson checked the bids and told the commissioners that Snyder's company had the lowest bid with the exception of one item for printing bonds, and that there was a difference of $2.50 per set of bonds, but that Dawson said that was a small matter and should not be considered and that Dawson recommended that Snyder be given the contract. Other members of the board of commissioners agreeing the contract was awarded to Snyder and a docket entry was made.

Funk told how Snyder afterward called him to the storage room and pretended to show him some books, saying that the material was like that his company would use. Snyder then put the money in his hand as he shook hands with him and quickly left the room. Funk said he put the money in his trouser pocket and on his way home looked and saw that it was five $20 bills.

When the defense attorneys asked Funk concerning a conversation he had with Clarence Keller, an employe of the county highway department. E. W. Atkinson assistant attorney for the state, then objected to the question, after a spirited debate the court sustained the objection. Atkinson said, "we do not object to try Dawson, Clark, Kelham and Funk, but that at this time the question would lead into other questions that were not involved in this case." H. C. Springer, one of the state's attorneys, did not concur in the objection entered by his co-counsel, and that he would like to hear the testimony concerning the conversation had with Keller, who was later fired from his job. Prosecutor R. W. Sharpless said that if the question was answered it would bring in other witnesses that would require two or three more days to hear the case.

The arguments began after the noon adjournment. Ira M. Holmes of Indianapolis, Paul Dunton of Lagrange and H. W. Mountz of Garrett spoke for the defense. The defense attorneys did not dispute the evidence introduced showing that Snyder had given Funk the money, but they contended that the contract entered into was void of legality, and that Snyder had not made any promise or agreement to pay Funk the money for giving him or his company the contract for the printing supplies, and for that reason there could be no conviction on the indictment as prepared.

Mr. Mountz entered into the argument in behalf of his client from the point of view that there was no conspiracy on his part, but that there were other conspirators who were guilty and he pointed out County Auditor Dawson and Deputy Sheriff Zimmerman as being the arch conspirators who framed Funk and made a goat out of Snyder. He said that he did not think that the defendant should be convicted on the indictment.

H. C. Springer, Richard Sharpless and E. W. Atkinson spoke for the state, and made it plain that the indictment was specific and that there was no question of doubt as to Snyder giving Funk the money. Mr. Springer made it emphatic that he did not believe that the defendant was to blame for the giving of the money, but that he did so in order to carry out the conspiracy of the frame-up of Mr. Funk. He also stated that he would like to see the guilty ones punished and let the chips fall where they may.

Funk Not Indicted

County Commissioner Funk was not indicted by the grand jury at the time that Snyder was indicted. Judge Endicott had received information that it was charged that a bribe had been given Funk and he ordered the grand jury called. He appointed E. W. Atkinson and H. C. Springer to assist County Prosecutor R. W. Sharpless in the investigation, in order that there might be no claim made that there was any political complex in the investigation.

In the finding of the grand jury it appears that Mr. Funk had not entered into any conspiracy to accept a bribe, and the mere fact that the money was given to him was insumcient to warrant an indictment against him.

Following the trial Mr. Funk gave the following statement to The News for publication:

"I never met Mr. Albert Snyder until the day upon which the printing bids were received. On the morning of that day County Auditor Dawson brought Mr. Snyder to me and introduced him and informed me that he represented the North State Publishing Company. After introducing us Mr. Dawson walked away and I had a short talk with Mr. Snyder in which he informed me that his company was expecting to bid on the county printing and would like to have their bid given careful consideration. I informed him that his bid would be considered along with the others and that the lowest and best bidder would receive he contract. That was all of the conversation we had at any time about the letting of this contrac and he never at any time suggested anything to me about the payment of money or any other improper consideration in connection with the matter.

"Later in the day the bids of four printing companies which had been submitted, were opened by the auditor and the board of commissioners. I was acting as chairman of the board and before the bids were opened I told Mr. Dawson that the board would not want to be responsible for making the decision as to which bid was the lowest but that they would have to act upon information from him, as he, Mr. Dawson, knew more about the needs of the various county offices and the kind and amount of supplies that would be needed than the members of the board did. When the bids were opened they were discussed by the board and the county auditor and Mr. Dawson made the computations and informed us that on two of the printing classifications Mr. Snyder's company was the low bidder and upon this statement the two classifications were awarded to Mr. Snyder's company and the other classification to the Fort Wayne company.

"Some time after the bids were accepted, Mr. Snyder called me from the commissioners room where we were in session, into the back room of the auditor's office to look at some tax duplicate books and while I was talking to him there he placed something in my hand and walked out. Upon looking at what he had placed in my hand I found that it was a closely folded bunch of bills amounting to $100.00. I immediately concluded that someone was trying to entrap me, but not knowing who was included in the conspiracy I was at a loss what to do. Mr. Snyder had immediately left and the county attorney was absent on that day.

"I later advised Mr. Springer, county attorney, what had taken place and requested him to send for Mr. Snyder and tell him to return at once, but Mr. Snyder did not return until several efforts had been made to induce him to do so. About a month later Mr. Snyder did come back to Auburn and then I returned to him the money which he had placed in my hands.

"A couple of days after the letting of the printing contract, Mr. Clarence Keller, an employe of the county road department, called upon me and informed me that a person had been stationed in the county auditor's office and saw Mr. Snyder give me some money and that if I would agree to the re-election of Marion Clark as county highway superintendent, nothing would ever be said about the matter, but if I did not help re-elect him the matter would be reported to the Grand Jury. I immediately informed Mr. Keller that he should go back and tell the conspirators who had sent him to me that whatever happened Mr. Clark would lose his job at the first meeting of the county commissioners in January and that there would be a new highway superintendent elected.

"I voluntarily appeared before the Grand Jury, waived any claim of immunity toward myself, and have concealed nothing. I leave it to the people of DeKalb county to pass judgment upon this whole transaction, satisfied that their sense of decency and fair play will place the blame where it belongs."

VOL. XLIV — ST. JOE, DeKALB COUNTY, INDIANA, THURSDAY, JULY 3, 1930 — NUMBER 27

HELD OLD SCHOOL REUNION

An ideal day, ideal place, will long be cherished by the ones that made the pilgrimage back to the old school ground.

The morning was spent in pleasant greetings of friends and admiring the new school building that seems perfect in all its appointments.

At the noon hour, each one was merry in kid fashion in helping get dinner, which was served in the splendidly equipped domestic science room ,and such a chatter, and oh, the good eats. Mrs. Auber Butler, the teacher of last year, served the coffee and such a beverage that our grandmothers might envy.

Mrs. Thomas De Vilbis and Mrs. A. A. Bowser, of Fort Wayne, gave a half hour musical, during the rest period.

The president, Dr. Carey called the meeting to order asking Rev. Stoll to offer prayer in remembrance of those that have passed to the beyond, and guidance for those that are left.

Short talks were given that were very interesting and entertaining; two comic readings were given by Mrs. Thad Brown, of Hamilton, Ohio. The president introduced our own poet, Dr. A. R. Wyatt, of Fort Wayne, who gave one of his splendid poems "My old farm home" followed with the business meeting. The members voted thanks to our congenial trustee, W. G. Erick, who was present, for the use of the school building, who in response directed the thanks to Spencer Township, that has made the school possible. They also voted thanks to Mrs. Auber Butler for the splendid coffee so graciously served.

They voted also to hold the meetings annually in same place and name changed from Old School Reunion to Spencerville School Reunion.

Officers for the coming year are:

President, Dr. W. W. Carey.
Vice Pres., Mrs. Ella Fischer.
Sec.-Treas., Mrs. Mattie Hart.

WIDNEY FAMILY HOLDS REUNION

The members and descendants of the Widney family, pioneers of DeKalb County, held their annual reunion at Eckhart park Thursday. Visiting, a basket dinner and a program of music and talks comprised the day's activities. Plans were made to compile the early history of the family, which has been traced back to 1600, the time of Prince William of Orange, under whom Col. Widney fought. Greetings were read from relatives unable to attend the reunion and the following officers were elected for the coming year: President, Waite Widney of Auburn; vice president, Ralph Sechler of St. Joe; secretary and treasurer, Mrs. Carl Carpenter of St. Joe. Among the cities represented at the gathering were Auburn, St. Joe, Garrett, Butler, Fort Wayne, Mount Vernon, O., and Chicago, Illinois.

ABLE TO RETURN FROM THE HOSPITAL

Mrs. Chas. Cochran was returned home Thursday afternoon from the Garrett hospital, where she was a patient for a week, nursing injuries received in an automobile accident in which she was severely cut about the arm. Mrs. Cochran is improving slowly although she is in bed most of the time. Mrs. Areitta Wilcox is here taking care of her.

"My Old Farm Home"

Given by Dr. A. R. Wyatt, Ft. Wayne at Old School Reunion

I want to go back to my old farm home
Up on the County Line,
And view the scenes of my boyhood days
Where I romped and played for a time.

I want to climb up on the beams in the barn
And somersault down into the straw,
And climb right up and do it again
And defy my old father's law.

I want to go out on the old beaver pond
When the ice is smooth and strong,
And put on my skates and glide swiftly away
While singing a merry old song.

I want to go out to the old sugar camp
When the sap is mounting high,
And drive the spiles into the old sugar trees
And hear them moan and sigh.

Then haul the sap to the boiling pit
And pour it into kettles and pan,
And build up a fire and watch it boil
Until ready to store in the can.

I want to climb up in the old harvest tree
And get astride of a limb,
And get my fill of the luscious fruit
That grows way out on the rim.

I want to go out in the woods in the fall
When the nuts are nice and brown,
And fix up a bunt 'gainst the big hickory trees
And watch the nuts tumbling down.

I want to follow the old school path
Through the meadow and woods far away,
Where I went to school when I was a lad
Long before my hair turned gray.

Some things that occurred on the old home farm
I do not care to recall,
For some nights were so short and my slumber so sweet
I didn't want to get up at all.

But Father would come to the foot of the stairs
And in a loud voice would say,
"Come boys, it is time for you to get up,
The horses must have their hay."

We would put on our clothes in the cold upper room
And shiver and yawn all the while;
Then go to the barn and feed the stock,
With never a word or a smile.

We got hay for the cows from the mow
And corn for the hogs from the bin.
And, once while dipping up swill for the pigs
My brother, Sam slipped and fell in.

His feet were up in the air
His head was under the swill.
Sister Rate came out from the back kitchen door
And pulled him out with a will.

He sputtered and strangled and spit
And he was a dreadful sight,
But he soon got his breath and a change of clothes,
And then he was feeling alright.

My Father was very faithful
In observing his family prayer.
And he never neglected that service
No matter how many were there.

The work was never so urgent
Even in the busiest time;
When he did not read his bible
And ask a blessing Divine.

Father felt that the tasks were lighter
And accomplished with greater care,
If the day was begun and ended
By reading his bible and prayer.

So I want to kneel at the family alter again
And hear my old Father's prayer,
As he thanked the Lord for His goodness
And His loving and tender care.

As he prayed for the state and the nation,
His family and friends so true,
And asked the Master's guidance,
In all he attempted to do.

These prayers have a deeper meaning now,
As I ponder them o'er each day,
And I cherish them more fondly
Since Father has passed away.

I am trying to follow his leading
And though I never can pray his prayer,
I am hoping to see his face again
Some time, some where.

BEAMS AND COMPANY SELLS OUT

Beams & Company, as a business firm, came to an end on last Friday after fourty-three years of continued business activity. Beams & Company has conducted a general store in Spencerville since the year 1887 in which the business management has always been conducted by the Beams family.

On last Thursday the store was closed, while the stock was being invoiced and transferred to Noah Eggerley, of Fort Wayne, the new owner and manager.

Mr. Eggerley has been in business before and is familiar with the business.

The business known as Beams & Co., was formerly established in the year 1860 by George Barney and at that time it was known as Barney's Store. At some time after 1860 the store was owned by the two sons, Sol and Frank Barney who later sold the stock and building to Henry and John Beams.

The Beams Brothers, in connection with their store, conducted an undertaking business which developed into a flourishing business of which many small town businesses were capable in those days. Upon the death of John Beams, his son, Edward took over his father's interest in the year 1901 and this partnership continued until 1915 when Edward died leaving Henry as the sole owner until the year 1922 when he passes away leaving the store to his oldest son, Frank to manage for his wife, Mrs. Beams.

At a later date, Frank purchased the store for himself and has operated same until the recent retirement. During these 43 years of business activity Beams & Co., has seen people born and depart from this life, traversed through several different periods of business prosperity, seen seven presidents elected to the head of the nation, and many business firms come and go in Spencerville during that time.

Mr. H. B. Lewis of Fort Wayne; H. G. Hursh of St. Joe, Joe Goldsmith of Fort Wayne and F. L. Beams and family conducted the inventory of the stock.

The Spencerville people, while welcoming new enterprises in the community, are sorry to see the business land mark cease because it was looked upon as one of the pioneer industries of the town, whose ancient public service to the community was held in reverence and esteem. The News says goodbye and hello.

Later: This stock of goods was sold to F. E. Jackson of Angola, who is now in charge of the business. Every item in the stock is being sold at greatly reduced prices and by next week his ad will carry the store news that the entire community will be interested in.

ANOTHER CITIZEN HAS PASSED

In the death of Mrs. Barbara Ellen Smith, which occurred last Wednesday evening at the home of her son, Earl, St. Joe has lost another of its well known and respected citizens.

She was the daughter of James P. and Martha Walker, and was born in DeKalb County, February 25, 1862, and departed this life June 25, 1930 at the age of 68 years and 4 months, after a very short illness.

She was united in marriage to William Smith in December, 1882, and to this union one son was born, E. B. Smith. In her early youth she became a member of the Lutheran Church and in 1915 she joined the Church of Christ of St. Joe.

Besides her son, she leaves two brothers, J. F. Walker, of South Bend and E. W. Walker of Hicksville.

The funeral services were held from the home Saturday afternoon, conducted by Rev. J. N. Scholes. Burial was made in White City Cemetery at Spencerville.

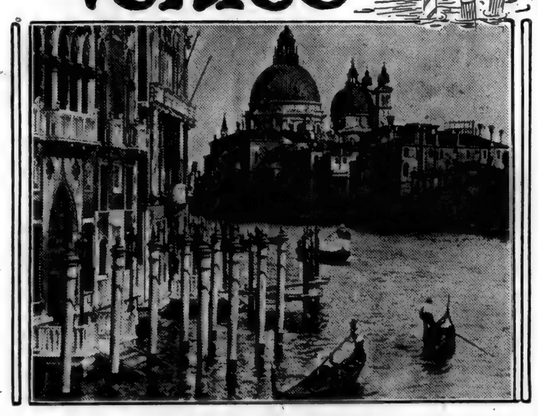
How To See Venice



Scene on the Grand Canal, Venice.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

WITH the opening of the summer travel season the paths of travelers in Europe lead again to Venice, which, with its unique streets of water, seems to exercise a lure more potent than cities wholly of the land.

The traveler should not expect too much of Venice. It is hardly fair. No great city can exist on narrow canals and be entirely a thing of beauty. One necessarily has had dreams of Venice and goes there with marked preconceptions. This follows reasonably enough, for so much has been written about this city of the sea, and of course the rosy, romantic aspect has been presented. If one does not set his mark inordinately high Venice will charm him. Novelty will "pinch hit" whenever beauty strikes out.

By all means the visitor should arrange to arrive in Venice by night. Under soft moonlight or under the rays of the dim and infrequent "street lamps," Venice puts her very best foot forward and strives to make the most extravagant dreams come true. The deep shadows under its bridges and the palace arches, the mysterious narrow black canal entrances, the picturesque leaning posts, the gentle lapping of the waves against the walls and steps, the swish of the paddles, the half brusque, half songlike calls of the gondoliers as they approach blind corners, perhaps the musical song of a gondolier in the distance—all combine to give one an entrancing entrance into the City of Canals. He leans back on his cushions during the long boat ride to the hotel—for of course traveler and luggage must go by boat—quite contented with life. This is Venice, and it is quite as it should be.

What the Day Reveals.

A night arrival is a ruse but a successful one. It is as though one should contrive to meet a once beautiful lady, no longer young, at an evening garden party. Her wrinkles become soft lines. When they face you in the pitiless light of the morrow they will have a certain suggestion of familiarity and memory will make them less harsh.

The first day in Venice discloses indubitable signs of ugliness as well as of beauty. Picturesque gondolas pass on the Grand canal. So do the unpicturesque Venetian "street cars"—squat steamboats, little, but all too large beside the gondolas—their sawed-off stacks belching dirty black smoke. They raise choppy waves, as do the swifter little motorboats. The gondoliers glare at them and the traveler joins them in spirit in the choice Italian curses that they must be uttering under their breath.

More gondolas pass—and the trash boats of the municipality. In the waters that seemed so fair last night floats every conceivable sort of rubbish. Yonder is the beautiful facade of a fine old palace, and beside it a building from which the stucco has fallen in great patches disclosing ugly bricks beneath. Perhaps the stones are failing away, too, at the waterline, letting the waves reach in for an inevitably greater destruction. Green slime covers the steps and the tilted wooden posts are rotting. Time is not the only desecrater of Venetian walls. The hand of the advertiser has been busy, too. And some of the walls that Dandolo loved and that scores of poets have sung about now inform the occupants of gondolas and "street cars" of products that can be purchased to their supposed advantage.

But thanks to a night arrival these things do not worry the visitor over much. He turns rather to the domes of Santa Maria della Salute with a tangle of masts against the sky; to the arch of the history-encrusted old Ponte Rialto; to the incomparable spires and domes of the Cathedral of San Marco.

One finds that there is a surprising amount of dry land life in Venice. A veritable maze of alleys and calli (little streets) and fondamenti (canal side-walks) exist. The best one can hope to do in a short stay is to gain a superficial acquaintance with the main way between San Marco and the Rialto.

Piazza San Marco.

The ways, whether narrow alleys or somewhat wider calles, have no sidewalks, of course. The entire space, such as it is, is for pedestrians. At intervals the narrow ways open up into "campi" as the little squares are called. The name, "Piazza," has been reserved for the great square of San Marco facing the cathedral—the ultimate in dry spaciousness in Venice.

If one has only a picture knowledge of Venice, as all the world has not been there has, the Piazza San Marco will prove a surprise. The little open space that holds the famous statue of the Lion of San Marco is not the real piazza but only the anteroom, the piazetta. Well behind the lion column, around the Campanile lies a square greater than many a city with an unlimited supply of terra firma can boast. No wheeled or four-footed traffic uses this great square. It is given over entirely to humans and pigeons. Thousands of the latter make the Piazza San Marco their home, and there is seldom a time during the day when one can cross the square without carefully picking his way to avoid stepping on them.

When night falls again and cloaks the inevitable tawdry spots of an old city built on piles, one forgets his criticisms of the day. Out on the lagoon at the mouth of the Grand canal, in a boat lighted by gaily colored lanterns, a company of musicians and singers begins a serenade. The gondolas of tourists join the throng of slender black forms bobbing gracefully up and down, each with a silent, statuesque figure standing at its stern. Soft music and the gentle swish of wavelets fill the air. The lights of the Lidos gleam in the distance while nearer at hand black masts and spires stand out against the sky, the soaring shaft of the Campanile topping them all.

The Three Lidos.

Venice's playground is the Lidos, the chain of low sand islands across the lagoon, which have ever guarded the city from the Adriatic. Without these isles and the tide they control, Venice, or at least the Venice that is so well known, would never have been born.

On the Lidos were the original settlements that led to the establishment of the city of Venice on the islands of the lagoons. When Attila and his Hun hordes swept down on Europe in 452 A. D. many of the inhabitants of the regions farther inland took refuge on the Lidos. From 742 to 809 the seat of government of the region was at Malamocco, a few miles south of the present Lido bathing resort on the same island. The encroachments of the waves during the spring and autumn storms, and the vulnerability to attacks from enemy navies, led, in 809, to a general exodus to the islands on which the present city is built.

The Lidos today consist of three principal long sandy islands, divided by narrow water channels, and scarcely far enough above the water to be distinguished from clouds when seen from a distance. The Litorale, or beach, of Malamocco is the largest and most important, as it contains both the famous bathing resort and the small village of Malamocco. The Litorale of Pellestrina is a strung-out village of fishermen and gardeners. Along it are portions of the great seawall, for, although the Adriatic protected its daughter from the guns of the heavy-draught vessels of the Middle ages, it exacted constant homage in stone walls and breakwaters. The Litorale of St. Erasmo, north of the Lido, is shorter and less important.

Fine Bathing Resort.

At one time there were five ports on the channels between the islands, but that at St. Erasmo was closed to increase the volume of water at the Lido port nearby.

The amount of tidewater that entered the lagoons through the port channels bears upon the welfare of the city. If it had ever been more than normal, large vessels could have sailed up to the Grand canal (as they do today, due to dredging, however) and Venice would have needed heavy fortifications in place of airy palaces. If it had been any less, the city would have been malarial and unhealthy. Malamocco is the main approach today for vessels of heavy draft. The other ports, Tre Porti, and Chioggia, together are not as important as the Lido.

The Lido, however, owes its chief renown to the fine bathing beach facing the sea. Along its windswept sands Byron and Shelley raced their horses before the vogue of sea bathing. Here artists set up their easels to catch that soft and luminous harmony of Venice from a distance.

The SANDMAN STORY

ABOUT THE FIREWEED

"COME," said the members of the fireweed family, "we must take some beauty and color to those black, burnt sections where the fires have raged."

So the members of the fireweed family followed along as members of the fireweed family always have.

"It was Great-Great-Great-Great-Great-Great-Great-Great-Great-Great-Great-Great-Great-Great-Grandmother Fireweed who started the idea in the first place," said the tall young member of the fireweed family, who was talking for the others.

"Maybe I should add a few more 'Greats' there, but you understand what I meant—that it happened a long, long time ago.

"I shall just speak of her as Great-Grandmother, for it would be hard to say all those 'Greats' each time I spoke.

"Glorious Trees in the Forest Had Been Destroyed."

"Now, Great-Grandmother heard of a terrible fire that had taken place.

"Word came to the members of the flower and weed families that there had been a terrible fire.

"Glorious trees in the forest had been destroyed, ferns and shrubs, trees of all kinds, moss—all had been destroyed.

"Only ugly, charred stumps had been left behind.

"The flowers all trembled when they heard the news. They even heard of the little wild flowers of the woods and of the forests which had been destroyed.

"'But what can we do about it?' the flowers all said. 'Burnt ground is so terrible. It is hard and dry—oh!' and they shivered again.

"'I will go and do what I can,' said Great-Grandmother Fireweed, 'and I hope my sons and daughters and my grandchildren and great-grandchildren will help me.'

"'We'll help you, dear Great-Grandmother,' they all shouted, for she was a great favorite.

"'We will learn to grow where the ground is dry and burnt. We will learn that secret.

"'Just as some people have the wonderful power of helping those who feel sad and are in trouble, so will we learn to help the burnt forests.'

"Great-Grandmother called for a coach. The Breeze Brothers carried her message to the Fairies and they brought her a coach.

"She climbed into it, and so did many of the children and the grandchildren.

"Then she went to the burnt forest. Oh, it made her flower heart ache to see the poor burnt trees. She sent the coach back for more of her family, and more, and more.

"The coach kept coming back and forth. The ponies of Fairyland drew it along, and you know the ponies of Fairyland can run so fast and can even fly over meadows and fields and valleys when they get a proper start.

"Then Great-Grandmother talked to all of her family.

"'It is enough that the people should have to see their forests destroyed,' she said. 'They have enough to bear in that. Let us do what we can to make it look less sorrowful and forlorn.'

"So Great-Grandmother started Fireweed housekeeping right then and there.

"She told us to begin at the bottom of our stems and open up our flowers until we reached the top, making the hillsides and desolate places gay with our bright crimson dresses and suits.

"Then she told us how to leave the seed vessels down along our stems, ready and waiting to split open when the autumn came, so that they could be blown far and wide, and settle where other ground was burnt and dry.

"Always we have done as she asked. Only one more thing she said before she finished the talk that day, and it was this:

"'When we do what we can to help, won't people do all they can to prevent forest fires?

"'We cannot be everywhere, nor do everything, and though we're gay and bright, we're not as the great trees of the forest are—splendid, after years of growth.

"'So won't people do all they can to see that there is never a picnic fire that is left without being entirely put out, and that never a lighted match or spark is left to do harm? We ask that of people, in behalf of the great, noble trees.'"

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

"MEETING HOUSE"

THROUGHOUT the United States, in the thousands of little villages that dot the country, we find in each a meeting house. And in almost every case, the meeting house is the church. And so deep seated is this institution that the words church and meeting house have in these communities come to be synonymous.

Just why this is so is an interesting survival of American history.

The first churches built in any numbers in America were erected by the Puritans. In the beginning, they were, of course, simply houses of worship only. Afterwards, however, as the communities grew, as it became necessary to formulate laws of government and as various other communal problems arose, problems that inspired discussions, debate and the general interchange of ideas, it became necessary to have a place in which to gather.

What more natural than that after prayer meeting, the church, which was as a rule the most pretentious and most roomy structure in the community, should be turned into a meeting house, by which name it soon came to be known and called.

NECESSITIES VS. LUXURIES

BUSINESS economists inform us that the first step in making a market for a new product is to create a demand for it. Jobbers must become acquainted with the product, and retail storekeepers must know all about it. One of the suggested ways for a new product to find a ready market is by a group of persons going from store to store asking for that particular article. Of course, they do not find it, but they set the storekeeper thinking. "What is this new thing?" they ask. In Doctor Conwell's celebrated lecture, "Acres of Diamonds," he recalled an early experience of his boyhood days. When clerking in a country store a person came in, asking for a jackknife. There were no jack-knives in stock. Presently another customer made the same demand, then a third came with the same request. After this third demand the store was supplied with plenty of jackknives for sale. Keeping a supply on hand proved to be a necessity. Not long since a representative from an insurance company called upon the writer to sell life insurance. He was informed that all was being carried that could be conveniently paid for. But the representative was wise at the game. It was only after he succeeded in making clear that additional insurance was necessary for adequate protection, that a new policy was written. "Necessity" won the argument.

L. A. Barrett.

We hear these days about the demands luxuries make upon us. Truly money is spent for luxuries, more so, perhaps, than for necessities. But necessities come first because they are essential. Luxuries are nonessential. Much money is spent upon luxuries because people have surplus money to spend. A wise man might be willing to borrow money to buy necessities, but he is a very foolish man who will borrow in order to buy luxuries.

Nature also cares only for necessities. You cannot find a single thing in nature that might be classified as a luxury. She refuses to have anything to do with the nonessentials. Anything that is not necessary to development is automatically shuffled off.

Luxuries, while enjoyable, should not be necessary to health, life or one's happiness.

Necessity is the mother of invention. —Farquar.

There is no virtue like necessity.—Shakespeare.

Their Happy Birthday

By JACK DEVINE

(Copyright.)

ELAINE YERDON was twenty-three years, three hundred and sixty-four days, nineteen hours and twenty-two minutes old.

It was George Moffett's birthday, too. In three hours and twenty-five minutes George would be twenty-seven. And time, as either of them would have told you, was flying.

They were lunching in a little French restaurant and George was keeping the waitress busy bringing him coffee. At exactly 1:22 he finished his sixth cup, snuffed out his twelfth cigarette, and uttered the nineteenth "damn" of the hour.

George, if he were to inherit his share of his father's estate, had to be married before 4:47. Elaine could not marry before six that evening without losing $50,000 left in trust for her by an uncle.

"And now," George protested, "we've got to dig ourselves out of the hole your uncle and my father left us in. If that charming aunt of yours hadn't insisted that you won't be twenty-four until six o'clock we could have been married this morning."

"The money goes to Muriel if I violate the terms of the will, and you can't blame Aunt Emma for wanting her own daughter to get it."

"Elaine, why won't you—"

"Please, George, don't ask me that again. I've as much right to my income as you have to yours. Besides, your hundred and twenty thousand isn't so much that we can afford to pass up fifty thousand dollars as though they were eggshells."

"I know, darling, but—but what are we going to do?"

"We might appeal to your father's lawyer once more."

"You saw what his last telegram said. Not a chance."

"Old Daniel seems to be our only hope then. We'll try him again, and if he can't help us now nobody can."

The traffic lights were with them most of the way to the building where Daniel Reid had his law offices, so the trip didn't take long.

As they alighted from the cab, Elaine's cousin, Muriel, came out of Old Daniel's office building.

"Elaine, darling." Her greeting was too effusive. "Hello, George. Happy birthday, both of you." Then, as though she had just learned a state secret: "Are congratulations in order? I hear today is to be your wedding day, too."

"They may be later," said Elaine, "but not yet."

"Well, good luck. I've got to be off. Maybe I'll see you later."

When they were ushered into Old Daniel's private office he held out both hands, giving one to Elaine and the other to George.

"Hello, children. Have you found a solution to your problem?"

"No," said Elaine, "we haven't and if you don't find one for us we'll never speak to you again."

"And we've only a couple hours more," put in George, "so you've got to think fast if you want to hear Elaine's charming chatter the rest of your life."

"Sit down, children," said Old Daniel. "I may have an idea. Now that this has resolved itself into a matter of split seconds," said Old Daniel, "you were born at 4:47, weren't you, George?"

"Yes, sir."

"In San Francisco? And you, Elaine, were born in New York at six o'clock. If you two are married at five minutes after six tonight Elaine will be abiding by the terms of her Uncle Robert's will. San Francisco is three hours behind New York, so it will be only three o'clock there. If you wire your father's attorney directly after the ceremony, he will get the telegram a few minutes after four."

"Suppose he looks at the filing time on the wire?" asked George.

"You still will have the alibi that it wasn't 4:47 in the city where you were born. It is a form of hair-splitting, I'll admit, but I'm pretty sure it will work."

"You darling," said Elaine, jumping up and kissing Old Daniel. "I knew you would find a way."

"Have you got your license?" asked Old Daniel.

"We got it yesterday," said George. "And the ring?"

"It's at the jeweler's, being engraved."

"You and Elaine run up there and get it," said Old Daniel. "I'll meet you at the Little Church Around the Corner at five minutes to six." He started to open the door for them, but closed it again quickly.

"Here, here. Stop that, you two. Trying to make me jealous, George?"

"No, sir," said George. "Just rehearsing the most important part of the ceremony."

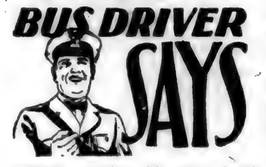
BILL, THE BUS DRIVER SAYS



"Better gamble with your dough than with your life, 'cause you can always earn more dough."

(By MARCUS A. DOW.)

I was ridin' on a train goin' about sixty miles an hour when the rattler come to a sudden, grindin' jarrin' stop. Some of us passengers got out to see what was all the sudden halt for. A completely busted automobile scattered a hundred feet along the right of way told a mute but awful story. Over in a field where it had been tossed by the train lay a shapeless lifeless thing which a moment before had been a livin' human bein'. Some guy pointed to a sign on the crossin' nearby, "Stop, Look, Listen." Had this guy believed in signs he would probably be alive today.

When you gamble with your life at a railroad crossin' you are puttin' your life up against a few lousy seconds of time. You gamble for time and your own life is the stake. There ain't no percentage in gamblin' with death. Shakin' dice with old bony fingers is bum sport, 'cause he gets most of the breaks.

A man bettin' on a horse stakes a few measly dollars that the horse he picks will win, and if it happens for once, he'll gain a few dollars, otherwise he loses his stake. But if you drive over a railroad crossin' and don't slow down and shift into low gear and don't take the time (or the trouble, if you call it that) and the precaution of lookin' both ways and listenin' for trains, I say if you don't do all that, you put up your life for the stake and gamble that you'll win.

If you want to bet your life, why not bet on a sure thing. Wait until you know it's a safe bet. Be like the Scotchman at the dog race. He watched five races and saw the mechanical rabbit shoot down the track and get home ahead of the dogs every time. Before the sixth race Scotty steps up to the bettin' booth and says, "I'll bet ten on the r-rabbit." He was bettin' on a sure thing.

Stop, look and listen, is a good old-fashioned rule. But its an ounce of prevention that's better'n all the gambler's luck in the world.

Strong Inner Tube Real Economy to Any Driver

Air pressure is as important to a tire as oil is to the engine—its very life depends on it. Leakage of only a few pounds of air pressure in a balloon tire is much more serious than in an old high pressure tire, because it considerably increases the movement and flexing of the tire, produces faulty tread wear quickly and increases the possibility of bruises and premature failure of the cord carcass of the casing. While the usual tendency is to put an old tube in a used casing and in many instances even a new casing, this is poor economy, because an old tube is generally thinned out and enlarged in size, which not only greatly increases the porosity or normal air loss of the tube, necessitating frequent inflation, but is almost certain to cause tire trouble due to the stretched out tube not fitting the casing and the resultant formation of wrinkles and pinches. A tire which is driven flat is quickly ruined.

Grave of Pet Horse Is Halting Work of Road

A horse's grave is delaying the widening of one of Texas' principal highways.

Before automobiles became common, Dr. W. W. Fowler made his calls behind Coley, a standard bred horse. Pensioned, Coley died and was buried where he used to watch automobiles pass on the highway.

Just before Doctor Fowler died he asked his heirs to see that Coley's grave be not disturbed. State highway department officials have been unsuccessful in preliminary efforts to obtain permission to move the grave and its painted fence.

Pedestrian Given Right at All Street Crossings

It is of prime importance to all motorists to know that a pedestrian has the right of way at a crossing, despite traffic signal shifts. This ruling is upheld by the United States Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia. In effect the court holds that pedestrians have the right of way not only at uncontrolled crossings, but also when they have entered an intersection on a green light and further holds that the pedestrian has the right of way until he reaches the opposite curb, without regard to the change of lights during his passage of the crossing. "When a pedestrian steps from a curb to cross the street, having a green signal with him, he does so by way of invitation and he cannot be charged with contributory neglect if the signal switches when he is in the street. Caught in this position, the obligation rests upon the motorist, not only to observe the situation, but to wait until the crossing is clear," the decision declares.

Motorists Urged to Use More Caution at Turns

Dr. Arnold H. Kegel, health commissioner of Chicago, declares a large percentage of pedestrian-vehicle accidents result from "thoughtless right-hand turning" on the part of drivers.

Urging motorists to exercise more caution when turning at street intersections, he said:

"A person starting across the street and walking in the same direction you are driving has his back to you as you approach the corner where you are going to turn. Even if that person sees you he does not realize you are going to turn right until you are very close. Surprise and panic and fright all combine to confuse him.

"Have your car under such positive control that you can avoid an accident regardless of what that person does. Children, especially are being injured, crippled and killed because some cars are not fully under control while making right-hand turns."

AUTOMOBILE FACTS

The real cause of noisy and screechy brakes is looseness, and the screech is a high pitched vibration.

British magistrates have held careless pedestrians liable for road crashes and ordered them to pay damages.

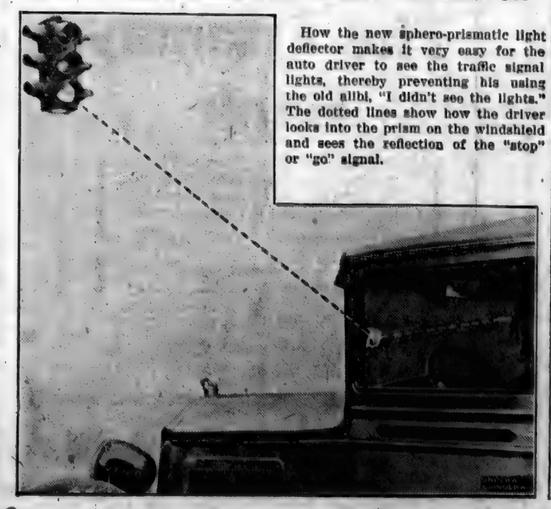
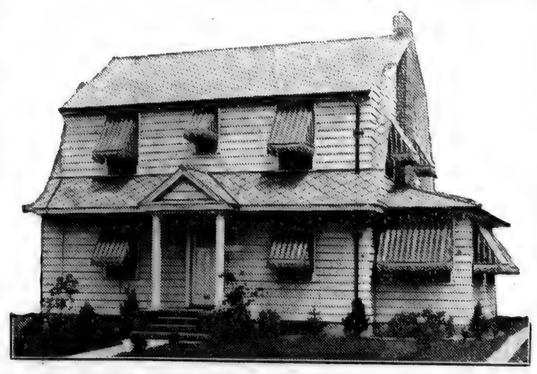
Should the engine seem very rough at speeds of from 22 to 28 miles per hour when accelerating on a moderate hill the vibration damper may need attention. It may become rusty after a winter of use.

NEW SPHERO-PRISMATIC LIGHT DEFLECTOR



How the new sphero-prismatic light deflector makes it very easy for the auto driver to see the traffic signal lights, thereby preventing his using the old alibi, "I didn't see the lights." The dotted lines show how the driver looks into the prism on the windshield and sees the reflection of the "stop" or "go" signal.

Suggestion of Colonial Style Is Seen in This Attractive House



A very definite suggestion of the colonial style is seen in the design of the house and like the true colonial the plain, rectangular form makes possible an excellent utilization of space in the interior arrangement while the exterior possesses a lasting attraction.

Mr. William A. Radford will answer questions and give advice FREE OF COST on all subjects pertaining to practical home building, for the readers of this paper. When planning to build a home a person does not have to go far to find a suitable design. Of course, he takes into consideration the amount of money he has to invest in a home, the size of the family, and the lot upon which the house is to be built. It is the modern idea to build homes of a size which will supply the family with the needed room, but the old-fashioned plan of having spare rooms, both living and sleeping, does not meet with much favor in these days of higher building costs.

For these reasons one cannot go wrong in selecting the colonial type of architecture. In the house illustrated a very definite suggestion of the colonial style is seen in the design of the house and, like the true colonial, the plain, rectangular form makes possible an excellent utilization of space in the interior arrangement. At the same time the exterior boasts of a lasting attraction, and the home of this style will be one of which the owner may well feel proud.

This house is 28 feet long and 24 feet deep, exclusive of the sun parlor projection. It contains six rooms, there being the usual trio of living room, dining room and kitchen, on the first floor with an alcove sitting room off the living room. Then there is the sun parlor, 13 feet long and 7 feet 6 inches wide, and three good-sized bedrooms and bathroom on the second floor. The floor plans show how these rooms are arranged, and the sizes of each one.

This is an economical house to build, as it is of frame construction set on a concrete foundation with brick steps.

Modern Architecture Really Not So Modern

Americans who journey to Europe to view ancient cathedrals and castles need do so no more if it is antique architectural beauty that they really seek. On this side of the Atlantic is an architecture that was great when England and France were peopled with semi-savages. And, what's more, it set the key for much so-called modern architecture that is being developed today.

These are the opinions brought back by a group of American architects returned from Uxmal, Chichen-Itza and other long buried cities of Yucatan, now being uncovered by archeologists of the Carnegie institution. Chichen-Itza, once a city of at least 250,000 Mayans, gives evidence of the highest civilization of its period in its magnificent temples, palaces and other buildings, says Kenneth Clark, one of the party, writing in American Architect.

"This race of cultured Indians wrote the modernists' story on carved limestone and left ample proof of their knowledge of geometrical design in ornaments that set a mark for the modernists to shoot at," he declares. "These people created an architecture from the pure genius of conception, and that it was a great architecture is amply proven by what lies before our eyes."

Popularity of Walnut Dates From Early Times

Walnut, which is by long odds the most popular cabinet wood today, has been used for the better class furniture in certain parts of the world almost from the very beginning of furniture. It was the most favored wood of the great Italian cabinet makers of the renaissance. Later on, during the latter part of the Seventeenth century, walnut was first introduced into England. Furniture of the periods known as "William and Mary" and "Queen Anne" was almost exclusively of walnut. Ever since colonial days American walnut has been widely used for fine furniture in this country.

Extra Long Hinges Are Best for Garage Doors

Do you have to pull and tug at your garage doors to open them only a few months after the garage is constructed?

This is because the contractor has not hung the doors properly. Regardless of quality, if they are not hung correctly, exposure to the weather and settling of the building are bound to cause trouble.

Doors should make the garage water-tight and should stay open when the automobile is backed out.

Extra long hinges will distribute the weight of the door and give greater satisfaction.

Latest Clever Conceit in Use of Wall Paper

One of the latest clever conceits in the use of wall paper, introduced at a spring exhibit of a New York decorator, combines a metal paper with a scenic.

A model living room was hung in a brocaded silver paper from base board to ceiling. And on one wall at one end of the long room, creating a vista from the davenport and the accompanying grouping of chairs, a scenic was inserted.

Four strips of the scenic were used showing a springtime panorama in delicate grayed tones with blue hills in the distance, misty trees, drooping bushes of orchid flowers and little rifts of yellow fields.

There was a feeling of silvery haze in the Maytime scene that was in perfect harmony with the surrounding silver background on the rest of the wall. And at the same time the metal walls were relieved of monotony. Not only this, but the perspective in the scenic gave length to the room. And one has all the unique value of metal paper on the walls, with a wide area of softer tones for relief to the eyes.

The scenic is bound in a narrow strip of the same grayed orchid and green border that finishes the silver paper at the ceiling and dado lines.

Clinker Bricks, Once Discarded, Now Popular

Ten years ago the clinker brick, so called because it frequently came out of the kiln with the fused appearance of a real furnace clinker, was a total loss to the manufacturer and was usually chucked into the rubbish heap. Today clinker bricks are used in the construction of the most attractive brick houses and sell at a higher price than the run of kiln brick. The percentage in any kiln is small, and the clinker brick has become quite popular.

Central Hall Type Plan Makes Popular Residence

Probably the plan most frequently utilized for the house of moderate size is the central hall type, with living room on one side, dining room on the other. To the visitor entering the front door, be he friend or foe, 90 per cent of the first story is spread open before his eyes. And if he but take the logical next step forward, behold! he will be up the stairs and right into the sleeping quarters.

The lock is one of the most important pieces of hardware. Its principal parts are bolt, key and key protection, the last named being the obstacle to be removed by the key before it can operate the bolt.

Probably Al Capone wanted the fire water to put out the fire works during the Fourth.

And now abideth crape, dope and hilarity, these three, and the greatest of these is hilarity.

Between now and the fifth of July any one wishing to sit down while in town had better sit on the side walk.

The best way to illustrate the patheticness of the fool character in your community is not to criticise one but cease to be one yourself—fair enough.

Some one has said who knows that the devil inspires his followers to be the worst scullions ever, and then gets jealous when they out-qualify him.

Fish and Game Club, attention: Have the state pass a law forbidding certain animals from bathing in the river to keep them from killing the fish.

When people become riled up on the issue of the day, the times can be said to be stirring times. Stirring times always produce reforms. Pessimism is the forerunner of optimism. Father Time says in his prescription, "shake well before using."

The Dallas Journal reports that in a highway safetly campaign, 400,000 old automobiles will be scrapped because they are unfit to be driven. This is all to the good, but something should be done also about the new cars that are scrapped because of unfit drivers.

Just how would the religious teachings of Capone and similar citizens of his brew be exchanged for the Anglo Saxon, puritanical conception of government by changing a single statutory law? If ever the 18th amendment is removed, what will be put in its place? The big question and the big question mark?

Jay bird logic: We should have providence repeal the law of gravitation, there are too many air planes destroyed—repeal the ten commandments, there are too many murders and divorces—do away with the "law of no return" there are too many opportunities lost—do away with traffic laws, there are too many auto accidents—do away with the moral laws, there are too many people going bad—do away with our stomachs, they ache once in a while—do away with our brains, they have a storm twice in a while—do away with the church, they have a h-h-h-heck of a time.

Al Capone, the other president of the United States, is being credited with the theft of $100,000 worth of liquor from the government ware houses in Chicago. This liquor was taken from a disguised car load of lumber shipped by agents of Capone from Florida and other sources. The United States government raids joints and trucks and puts the counterbrand in ware houses and the Capone government raids the U. S. government and takes it back again—a game of checkers. The question arises: Would the doom of the boot legger be sealed if the U. S. government would go back into the booze business and dispense this fluid out of ware houses to the consumer? Would this prevent smuggling as has been demonstrated here in this instance. Would the cheapness of liquor, if sold by the government, freeze out the boot legger, murderer and general law breaker? Just how would an annulment of a law mystically transform Capone and his crew to the law abiding, tranquil citizen who respects the constitution of the United States?

Uncle Josh Celebrates

Yes sir, by gosh, we had a 4th of July celebration at Punkin Center. All people of Punkin Center turned out and everybody had a great time. The meeting was held in the grove down by the school house. Deacon Weatherspoon read the Declaration of Independence and then sort' a made a speech about the rebellion. Then some one thought that we ought to have a national salute. Bill Hawkins said he would go down to his blacksmith shop and get two anvils. Hen Weathersby came back and said that he couldn't find any powder in town so he fetched dynamite. We happened to remember that dynamite went off by means of discussion, so we threw stones at the anvils. Well, that's all I remember now. Hen Weathersby will be buried Tuesday.

Haven't found Bill Hawkins and the two anvils yet. Reckon as how I have had all the 4th of July I want cause Samantha says I am a durned fool. Ha! Ha! Ha.

The New Fourth of July

The whang-ity boom season of the year is about 36 hours away—the season that guarantees swollen heads and empty pocket books—head aches and burned toes. Never-the-less, this national holiday has undergone the greatest change in observance of all American holidays. From 1776 until now, 1930 there has been 154 Fourth of Julys, each one celebrated in a different spirit, as the years unreeled. The first celebration took place in the colonies one year after the signing of the Declaration of Independence by the firing of cannon followd by the reading of the Declaration of Independence to a quiet and submissive audience who cheered as the orator pointed out the great liberty that had been perpetuated by providence and pariotic resistance of the colonists. Jus imagine anyone being able to sit still long enough to hear the Declaration of Independence read on the Fourth of July now. It would be a physical impossibility—impossible because of the lack of interest the modern mind would have on the subject and impossible because the celebration would probably be taking place where you were sitting. There is quite a marked difference now from the old colonial conception of a Fourth of July celebration. Many people, old and young, in certain sections of the United States have shot fire works all their lives and haven't found out yet what it is all about. They think the Declaration of Independence is where a man tells his boss to go to a warm climate; where the wife tells the husband the "obey" stuff is all ancient history or where the child runs the home, etc.,—mostly etc. In colonial times the day was observed in a spirit of political sanctity—today in the spirit of bang-ity. The Fourth of July, like Decoration Day, is becoming commercialized for financial gain and a day to lay down the shovel and hoe and burn up gasoline and the public highways.

The recent laws of the various states have placed statutory limitation on the sale of fire works, both as to the time of sale and the size of fire works in an effort to stem the tide of fatality. The government, while sponsoring the continuance of the Fourth as a national holiday commemorating our independence, it does not believe it is necessary to slay a couple hundred of people every year to remind the nation of the men who died during the revolutionary period. It seems that our government spends most of its time creating laws to make the country safe and sane and not reckless and insane. It might be well to limit all celebrations to fire work displays to the safe and harmless sort. The commercial would be willing to comply.

Summer Care of Heating Plant Explained by Smoke Official

Chicago.—A thorough "going over" of the home heating plant in preparation for the next heating season and the use of a smokeless fuel, are urged by Frank A. Chambers, chief city smoke inspector, in his instructions issued to householders for the care of their home heating plants during the warm months.

Smoke, Mr. Chambers pointed out, is a serious health hazard. He said neglect of heating plants helps to produce more smoke. His instructions for the care of heating plants in the summer are:

"See that the ash pit, grates, tubes and all gas passages are clean. Clean thoroughly the smoke pipe connecting the heating plant and chimney. Clean out the chimney. This will improve the draft as well as prevent smoke from backing out of the heating plant into the basement, which usually causes the living rooms above to fill with smoke.

Points Out Fire Hazard.

"The smoke pipe or breeching should be examined thoroughly for leaks, and if rusted badly or leaking should be repaired or a new one installed. Defective flues often cause fires where the plaster above falls off, exposing woodwork to the flame coming through cracks in the pipe or masonry.

"Examine the grates and see if any sections are burned out. Burned out grates cause holes in the fire, resulting in a loss of heat and a fuel waste. See that grates shake properly and return to a level position. Adjust damper so that it opens full and closes properly. Fill all cracks with fireproof cement or stove putty. Air leakage causes the fire to draw poorly and increases the fuel consumption. See that all out doors on the chimney, in boiler or furnace, close air tight.

For Care of Heating Plant.

"If the basement or boiler room is damp during the summer cover the outside surfaces with a coat of preservative paint or a mineral oil that will prevent rusting."

Tests have shown, according to the Holland Institute of Thermology, Holland, Mich., that a quarter inch of soot, a nonconductor of heat, on the heating surface, requires 50 per cent more coal than is necessary if the boiler surfaces are clean.

The most efficient means yet found for cleaning the heating plant and chimney is a huge vacuum cleaner which comes mounted on an auto truck and in which a motor driven fan provides powerful suction. This machine, operated on the same principle as the household vacuum cleaner, sucks the dirt and soot out of the most remote and inaccessible parts of both heating plant and chimney, drawing the soot and dust into an enormous dustproof bag. No dust is raised in the house and there is no aftermath of grimy dirt in the basement or on the walks or lawns. The additional advantage is that it usually includes a thorough inspection service which reveals existing defects in chimney and heating plant itself, and enables repairs to be made during the summer months.

CLEAN HEAT PLANT CUTS REPAIR COST

Accumulation of Soot Found to Constitute Serious Fire Hazard.

For safety and economy, the heating system should be cleaned each spring as soon as the heating season is over, says the Holland Institute of Thermology of Holland, Mich. Ashes, soot and dust should be removed from chimney heater and flue pipe, and heat ducts and cold-air returns should be clean and free from obstructions.

If the heating plant is not thoroughly cleaned when the fire is discontinued, soot and ash particles which absorb moisture from the air, corrode or rust the inside of the flue pipe, reducing its thickness beyond the point of safety before the outside surface shows indications of damage. Accumulations of soot in the chimney constitute a serious fire hazard as soot is a condensed fuel which burns with a high degree of heat when ignited by hot sparks carried upward by the draft. Soot in the furnace is an enemy of heating as it is a nonconductor of heat, acting as an insulating material if allowed to gather on heating surfaces. Heating engineers have found that a "lining" of soot only one-eighth inch thick will reduce a plant's efficiency more than 25 per cent.

A giant vacuum cleaner, one of the new marvels of the mechanical age, has supplanted the unsanitary chimney sweep as a means of cleaning the heating system, and it does what has heretofore been a dirty job, quickly, thoroughly and without mess. The cleaner is mounted on an automobile truck and a motor-driven fan provides a powerful suction which is applied through a long flexible pipe attached to openings in the chimney and heating plant. This machine sucks the dirt and soot out of the most remote cracks and crevices and cleans the connecting pipes, blowing the soot and dust into an enormous dust-proof bag. The housewife appreciates the cleanliness of this method as it does not "raise a dust" in the house, nor is there an aftermath of grimy dirt in the basement or on the walks and lawns.

This system of cleaning heating plants is now available in most of the larger cities and towns. Home owners will be more sure of a first-class cleaning job by engaging cleaners whose equipment includes the powerful, motor-driven suction fan. This service usually includes a thorough inspection which will reveal any existing defects in the chimney or the heating plant itself, enabling repairs to be made during the summer months. The saving in fuel due to the increased efficiency of the plant more than pays for the cleaning, to which is added the benefits of cleanliness for walls, furnishing and wearing apparel and the virtual elimination of the residence fire hazard.

SUMMER COMFORT SECRET REVEALED

Are you going to suffer weary, sleepless nights during the forthcoming hot months of July and August, or are you going to be one of the fortunate few who even though they do not have a summer cottage alongside a cooling lake, will enjoy comfort and refreshing sleep though the night be torrid and sultry? queries the Holland Institute of Thermology.

Cool, comfortable sleeping rooms regardless of weather conditions are no longer an idle wish of those who have homes of their own equipped with what heating and ventilating engineers have styled air-conditioning systems. These are nothing more or less than the latest type warm air heating systems that function in such a manner as to render owners year 'round service and year 'round comfort.

In summer they produce indoor comfort by means of an electrically operated air propeller unit installed in the top of the furnace jacket. In operation, the effect of this fan is to produce a definite yet draftless current of air that circulates through the house by way of the heat ducts and the cold air returns. This gentle air motion suffices to carry away bodily heat and moisture, and the sensibility of comfort thus produced is equivalent to a drop in temperature of 15 to 20 degrees, though in actuality the decrease in temperature is but two or three degrees.

The comfort factor is further augmented by the elimination of pockets of stagnant air so oppressive and stifling in muggy weather. During the heating season, the function of the air propeller unit is to uniformly distribute warmed air throughout the house. In this respect it is highly efficient, as it virtually eliminates the wide differences in temperatures at ceiling and floor levels so generally characteristic of artificially heated homes.

Though standard equipment with warm-air systems of the humidifying or vapor-air type, the design and construction of the air propeller units is such that they may be installed in most types of warm-air heating systems now in use.

Wind is a Close Second to Fire

In destuction and damage to property, high winds are almost as culpable as fire. A wind need not be of tornado force to do serious damage; nor is wind damage a hazard peculiar to any section of the country. Exceedingly high and dangerous wind movements have occurred in almost every section of the country and history will undoubtedly repeat itself. Windstorm Insurance is very moderate in cost.

OBITUARY

Kenneth Rhoads, son of Charles Rhoads and Jennie (Freece) Rhoads, was born at Spencerville, May 17, 1907 and departed this life June 25, 1930 at Fort Wayne, being of the age 23 years, 1 month and 7 days. Death came after illness and suffering of nearly two years, during which time many efforts were made for the restoration of his health. With the exception of five years lived in Auburn he had lived in Spencerville.

He is survived by one brother, Robert of Spencerville and his father of Green Bay, Wisconsin. Many cousins also survive.

At one time he joined the Methodist Church of Auburn.

The funeral was held Saturday morning from the Spencerville Lutheran Church, with Rev. Stoll officiating.

LARIMORE–STEFFEY

The Mt. Olive Lutheran Church at Deer Creek, Indiana, was the scene of a pretty June wedding Sunday afternoon, when Miss Lillian Steffey, daughter of Rev. and Mrs. S. D. Steffey, of Deer Creek, was united in marriage to Harold F. Larimore, of East Chicago.

For the entrance of the bridal party, Mrs. Luther Cohee, pianist, played the "Bridal Chorus," from Lohengrin. Airs from Mendelssohn were sounded for the recessional.

The vows were read by the bride's father, Rev. S. D. Steffey at 1 o'clock before an alter banked with ferns and garden flowers. The double ring service was used.

A pretty costume of chiffon and lace in the shade of shell pink and amber was worn by the bride. It was fashioned sleveless, with a high waistline and full skirt which run to the long uneven lines. She carried an arm bouquet of bride's roses and baby breath.

An informal reception was held following the ceremony at the Steffey home. Only members of the immediate families attended.

Bouquets of garden flowers were arranged about the entertaining rooms of the home and a large wedding cake graced the bride's table.

Mr. and Mrs. Larimore departed in the early evening for East Chicago, where they will reside. The groom is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Larimore of Delphi.

WE DON'T HAVE THOSE OLD 8 mile speed limits NOW

Many states prohibited driving in excess of 8 or 10 miles per hour in "built-up" communities. Twenty miles per hour was once considered highly dangerous. Improvements in the automobile and advances in traffic control have changed all that. ¶ Likewise the constant improvements wrought by Shell in motor lubrication have made higher speeds safe for the automobile engine. That's the important thing about Shell Motor Oil. It is always ahead of requirements . . . ready now for next year's car. ¶ Low-temperature refining preserves all of the rich lubricating elements of Nature's best-balanced crude. No emergency ever finds Shell Motor Oil lacking in protective qualities. No wonder so many motorists are turning to Shell.

Opening the "Door of Unity" in Plymouth, England

Albert Halstead, American consul general at Plymouth, England, opening the "door of unity" leading to the Prys-ton house of St. Andrew's church. The service is unique in the history of the church because of its international character. Coincident with the opening of the door, the unveiling of the memorial to two American naval officers who were buried on the spot in 1813 took place.

In the Path of a Midwest Tornado

Tragic ruins which lie in the trail of destruction left by the series of giant twisters which tore through the east central portion of Minnesota and the west central portion of Wisconsin. Five persons were killed, 60 injured, thousands of dollars worth of property destroyed. The photograph was made at Randolph, Minn., one of the towns hardest hit.

What the Hatfields Are Like Today

Many of the present generation remember the famous bloody feud of the Hatfield and McCoy families in West Virginia. This is a new and interesting photograph of the present Hatfield family. They all hold public office in the town of Williamson, West Virginia, with the exception of the mother and the youngest son. They are, left to right: (seated) Mrs. Greenway Hatfield, Sr.; Mayor Wirt Hatfield; Sheriff Greenway Hatfield, Sr., and Jailer Wayne Hatfield. Standing, left to right: Assistant Postmaster Shade Hatfield; Postmaster Willard Hatfield, and Greenway Hatfield, Jr., who is attending the University of West Virginia.

Community Building

Comparatively Easy to Make Roads Beautiful

Our roadsides are in no small way the nation's nearest public park. To millions who can go no farther they are the only out-of-doors. To the roadside come the trees and flowering bushes and the sunlight on the grasses. They are embassies of nature to those who cannot travel from the beaten path.

But the roadsides of America now are unkempt and broken. Nature is hacked away. Ditches are foul; the flats piled with dumpings. The slopes are bare beside the hot-dog shacks. The road goes through to a destination, but the main destination which very often is the beauty on the way, usually is ignored.

To the building costs and maintenance of roads a 1 per cent addition, more or less, for aiding planted things and natural vegetation would double the roads' real value. At small expense parkways can be made along the public roads. Flowering trees can be set out. Slopes can be vine covered. The roadsides can be made the finest and most useful park of the entire nation.

Without doubt a great value of the public roads is yet to be realized. They are used by motorists seeking natural beauty. A trifle more expenditure, with restrictive measures against eyesores, would make them what the traveler hopes to find.

Too Little Attention Paid to Attractiveness

To some extent there has been a growing regard for attractiveness in building of dwelling houses and the design of premises; in both exterior and interior plans for business places, great and small; in the construction of hotels, office buildings and apartments, and even in filling stations. But we still have investors who insist upon putting up merely utilitarian houses, plain, unattractive stores, dry goods box styles of apartments and other merely serviceable construction, when for a little more outlay a much better investment could be made, or better results could be had even with the same expenditure of money and a little more application of intelligence. We still have home owners who could well afford to keep their houses and the lawns in order, but put no value on the factor of attractiveness; who do not appreciate the importance to themselves of making a "good appearance"; who are content to live in relative dinginess when they could give themselves a brighter outlook on life from their private domain.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Warning in London's Growth

London is pushing out its tentacles far and wide among what were once the rural beauties of the home counties. The existing population, encouraged by motor transport and electric railways, is creating new suburbs. Factories recently erected in the Greater London area are causing, according to Doctor Unwin, 20,000 people to move into it each year. A city which had all the potentialities of the most splendid in the world is spreading, not splendor, but dinginess, tawdriness, inconvenience and muddle over an area of 2,000 square miles. And all this spoliation is occurring, not because there is no room, but because there is no plan.—London Daily Chronicle.

Environment Counts

People reflect their environment. Those who live in shabby, down-at-the-hee's houses are likely to feel depressed and discouraged. We borrow much of our confidences and spirit from our surroundings. If they have nothing to give—no hope or confidence, no pride in home or joy in living—then they become a liability of such proportions that only the most herculean strength can resist them.—Exchange.

Give More Character

When discussing plans for the new home it should be remembered that "character" and "design" are two different things. A house may be designed well and yet be wholly lacking in character, or a house may be designed badly and possess character. Good design is obvious, but character is elusive and hard to visualize from a set of plans.

Trees Hurt by Wires

Wires or heavy ropes drawn tightly around a tree trunk or limb may slowly strangle the tree by retarding or stopping the free circulation of water or food, says the United States Department of Agriculture. The careless use of a long pruning-hook or other implement for breaking off small dead twigs should be avoided, the department adds.

Pecan Trees Line Highways

Terrell county, Oregon, has a pecan highway. By means of donations from various civic organizations more than 1,500 pecan trees have been planted along the highways.

To Beautify Roads

More beautiful highways are sought by the Missouri highway department. County and city schools are being asked to aid in improving the appearances of roadsides.

Modern English Youth Lacking in Sentiment?

Hundreds of church bells throughout England are silent because young men refuse to take any interest in the delightful, if somewhat strenuous, art of bell ringing.

"We require six hefty young men to pull the ropes," said Rev. E. M. Davys, vicar of Cromer church, recently. "Our bells have not been rung for nearly a year."

Cinemas, motor-omnibus services from villages to towns and football matches are among the reasons given for the shortage by E. A. Young, secretary of the central council of church bellringers. "The present age," said Mr. Young to a representative of the Sunday Express, "is a rotten age. It is almost impossible to get bellringers in either London or the country.

"At one time villagers were proud to do the work for nothing. The young man of today wants to know what he is going to get out of it. Nearly all bellringers now are either middle-aged men or women."

One Example That Upset Young John D.'s Theory

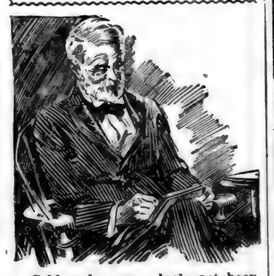
John D. Rockefeller, Jr., lecturing to a class at the Carnegie institute, declared that there was no such thing as luck. "No matter what seems to be lucky," he declared, "will prove strictly a case of cause and effect, when carefully analyzed. It is work and ability of some sort that makes success, even for those chaps whom we are prone to call lucky."

"And yet, Mr. Rockefeller," interposed a student, "I have a friend who really is lucky, with no sort of work or ability connected with it."

"You'll have to show me," grinned John D., Jr., and the class declared that its fellow member did make good when he said:

"Well, I have a friend who's got a wife and a cigarette lighter and they both work."

ONE PRESCRIPTION MADE FAMILY DOCTOR FAMOUS



Seldom has any single act been of greater benefit to mankind than that of Dr. Caldwell in 1885, when he wrote the prescription which has carried his fame to the four corners of the earth.

Over and over, Dr. Caldwell wrote the prescription as he found men, women and children suffering from those common symptoms of constipation, such as coated tongue, bad breath, headaches, gas, nausea, biliousness, no energy, lack of appetite, and similar things.

Demand for this prescription grew so fast, because of the pleasant, quick way it relieved such symptoms of constipation, that by 1888 Dr. Caldwell was forced to have it put up ready for use. Today, Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, as it is called, is always ready at any drugstore.

Whale's Diving Power

It would be impossible for a whale to descend to the bottom of the ocean at any considerable depth of water. Although it cannot be exactly known, it has been estimated that the maximum dive of the whale is approximately 100 fathoms—that is 600 feet—and at any greater depth than this the pressure of the water would be too great for the safety of the whale.

Here we see Chicago with its fine families, its beautiful homes, its great buildings; and then we see its poverty, its tenements, its bootleggers and its gangsters. And thus it is a colorful panorama that makes a background for characters who are as vivid and real as the people you find every day about you.

Margaret W. Jackson.

When the daughter of a well-to-do family makes a runaway match with the carpenter's son, the family, naturally, objects. The theme is not new. It is a famous complication of real life which, in its various angles, has provided inspiration ever since poets began to sing and novelists to write.

This is a story of youth and love that is as new and refreshing as the first violet of spring, yet its problems are those which might have confronted a pair of lovers at the dawn of civilization; but in this case they are settled in a truly modern manner, with the advantages of decision which common sense, freedom of thought and freedom of action are supposed to confer.

Infidelity and the overstressed triangle are absent. Art is the only jealous mistress here. It has been the achievement of the author to write a real love story of the present workaday world, a story in which maid and man, husband and wife, through all their stress, even anger and possibly hatred, feel the dynamic current which steadily draws them one toward the other.

CHAPTER I

Call Me Up

Her life began to have meaning and importance the day that Ernestine met Will again on Michigan boulevard. She had not seen him since they were both children, and the attachment she had formed for him then was a pale plant beside that which sprang up in her now. She was so beguiled with Will, so in love with his long nervous person, his burning black eyes, and his bright exclamatory ways, that nothing mattered to her except that he love her. Lillian always contended that Ernestine could have stopped the whole affair in its beginnings, but it is more than likely that she was wrong.

At that time Ernestine was surfeited with safety. She felt in herself the beginnings of spiritual indigestions at the security and complacency of the Bricelands. At school she had discovered that there were worlds beyond worlds outside of her mother's. Her family's outspoken conviction that society began and ended in their own particular group was a conviction entirely unjustified by facts. The oasis, Sheridan Park, had become lost long since in the great activity of Chicago, and what the Bricelands considered "old family" was unknown among the really rich and powerful of the city, as well as among the newly rich and arrogant "gold coasters" of the North side.

Her schooling was finished when Ernestine was twenty. Lillian had been out of school a year and had already taken up the threads of the life outlined for them by mamma's connections. The sisters were congenial and fond of each other. At first Ernestine had been more than satisfied—she had been actively happy—just to be with her mother and Lillian again, with Grandmother Briceland and old friends in the big lovely house on Sheridan road. There was an endless parade of parties and dances and weddings.

But after a few months Ernestine decided that to be reared in an "old family" group on the North side of Chicago was almost as bad as being brought up in a little town. She knew everything that every one hoped or did. Some of the younger people were becoming definitely ambitious, and aligning themselves with the gold coasters, or making entry, through school connections, into the older and richer society of other cities. The Bricelands were inaccessible to the horde of apartment house dwellers who were moving into Buena and Sheridan Parks, and crowding the North Shore with glass-enclosed tenements. Mamma disregarded the invaders superbly and refused to join the northward movement out of Chicago or the southward movement downtown. She would stay where she was, and Lillian complained that her attitude not only protected her from climbers, but also prevented the family from doing any climbing of its own.

But Ernestine sympathized with her mother's loyalty to old associations. Ernestine herself was without social ambitions. She was established among intimate friends. She had only to be natural, casual, mocking, and it was enough. Ernestine knew a strange nostalgia. She wakened at night, filled with the need to use her gifts more actively.

And then, she met Will.

It had been twelve years since she had last been him, but she knew him at once when she encountered him on Michigan boulevard one November afternoon after the Armistice. It was late afternoon, and the sky was thickening with dusk. Will stood with his shoulders against the great granite blocks of the library, looking out over the heads of other people, into the mysterious beauty of the clouds.

She stopped and looked at him, and her heart missed a beat lest this be some stranger who might respond too boldly to her stare. But she was sure it was Will. He did not see her at all, and his intense concentration confirmed her recognition of him. It was his old stare.

When she approached him and touched his arm, his glance came back from the clouds and rested on her face, and he smiled. His smile was charming. His whole countenance broke up into different lines and planes; his face seemed warmer, nearer.

"Hello, Ernestine," he said in a natural tone. "Did you get the bird book?"

She laughed with delight.

"Will Todd, you are incomparable." They were shaking hands now and laughing together. "To think that you remember me, after all this time. Ten years—no twelve! But—of course I got the bird book. I wrote and thanked you for it! Didn't you get my letter?"

Sat Leaning Forward, Looking at Each Other.

She was conscious of many things. Of his clothes, which were all wrong, too bright and loud, each garment chosen without regard to the whole. He was too white, like a person always indoors, and though he was tall, he was not at all robust. Yet he gave a distinct impression of energy, mental rather than physical. He seemed to Ernestine to be positively electrical, the most alive person she had ever known.

He put his hand within her arm and turned her southward, so that they walked shoulder to shoulder.

"Nary a letter," he answered. "I see now why I have spent all these years misunderstanding you. And you wrote me! My heart was broken, when I was ten. I've never trusted a woman since."

She laughed at his nonsense, but with a certain catch at her throat. When she was eight years old he made a beautiful book of colored bird pictures for her and bound it. He had brought it from far out on the Northwest side of Chicago, where he lived, to her home in Sheridan Park. She had been at dancing school that afternoon, and had never seen him since.

"It seems dreadful that you should never have been thanked for the book. I wanted to go to see you again, but no one would take me. But I spent a whole month's allowance on a gorgeous box of stationery with a huge gold E on every page, and I wasted most of it before I had a letter perfect enough to send you."

"I'll never have it now," he said. "It isn't right."

"I suppose I didn't address it correctly. Somebody should have helped me. But let me thank you now for the book, Will. It was beautiful. I have always treasured it. It was the only thing I had given to me that the giver made with his own hands."

"Don't thank me yet," he said, drawing her into an entrance and pushing a gilded button for the elevator. "Take tea with me, and thank me, in detail, and with repetitions."

As they ascended in the elevator he gave her arm a little squeeze, she looked up at his bright smile and smiled in return, memories flooding over her. He had always smiled charmingly. When he was a child she thought it was because he was lame that he smiled so sweetly, but now, he was free from any impediment that she could see.

Ernestine recalled the carpenter's wagon at the stone carriage block of her mother's house. It was a bright green wagon, with a green and yellow striped umbrella over the driver's seat. Old Peter Todd, who worked for papa, had got down from this high seat and turned to help his son. He—Peter—had come to repanel the dining room for mamma. As the boy's mother wasn't well, he explained, he'd had to bring him. Ernestine had at once extricated the tall thin boy, with a metal brace on one foot, from behind his father. He liked her. Silent with every one else, he was gay and friendly with Ernestine. He had come with his father every day that summer, and they had played together from morning till night. How kind mamma had been to him! Ernestine wondered if mamma would be as kind now?

She had never had so nice a playmate. Perched perilously on the high wagon seat, she had gone home with him and his father. The tiny house in which he lived had seemed to her like the little house on the plains in the story of The Wonderful Wizard of Oz. He had given Ernestine a pine shingle with a rippling American flag painted on it; and, after she came back from the lake in August, he had brought her the bird book, a duplicate of one of his own that she had admired.

And she had never seen him again—nor thanked him!

"What a charming place, Will!" she exclaimed, as they came out on an upper floor and into the room with the walls crowded with brass and metal relief work. Crowded, small, dark tables were set with colored linen runners. At every table there were women smoking, and throughout the room a sprinkling of men who looked strange to Ernestine. They had a foreign sophisticated air. They were not at all like papa or Loring.

They ordered pastry and coffee and sat leaning forward on their elbows looking at each other, smiling, remembering.

"But how about your brace?" she asked him. "Were you able to discard it at thirteen, as you expected?"

"Sooner. But walking without it was a staggering business for a year or so, I can tell. I'll never be a golf champion, and the American army had to go to France without me, but I'm well, really. I never think of it any more. It's such a darned interesting old world to kick around in, without wanting to play tennis. I work on the Sun, and often go home after two in the morning. I come over here sometimes, when it's quiet except for a few cars. The streets echo, and the strangest feeling of unreality comes over me."

"What do you do, Will, on the Sun?"

His eyes shone. His voice thrilled with enthusiasm and excitement.

"I work in the art department," he told her, and the way he put it, it was a "brag," a superlative announcement. "I've been there over a year now, and, Ernestine, I'm crazy about it. Lord, it's wonderful, the feeling you get on a paper. I've made some fine friends. John Poole is a friend of mine, and a good one, too."

Every one in Chicago knew John Poole, whose comic strip in the Sun was as much a feature of Chicago life as the beauty of the Blackstone reared against a winter sky.

"Why, Will, how fine! But what do you draw?"

He hitched his chair a little nearer to hers in his eagerness.

"Did you ever see, in a newspaper, the little curlicues around a half-tone—that's a photograph—decorations to make the picture, which may be odd in shape, fit into the type? I do those things, and lettering, and sometimes a spread." He sent a waitress for a paper, and showed her what he did.

"I get twenty-five dollars a week for it," he boasted. "And I'd do it for nothing, if they didn't pay me. The fellows are real guys, and we've got a regular boss. This is my day off, and here I am downtown, and going over there, pretty soon. I can't stay away. If you'll go with me, I'll drag you around the plant, and show you the big presses, and introduce you the Mr. Poole, and the fellows in the art room."

Only Surmises as to First Spoken Language

Many surmises have been made regarding the oldest language. In an attempt to discover what children would say if uninfluenced by established speech, Psamectichos, an Egyptian king, entrusted two new-born infants with a shepherd, with the strict charge that they were never to hear anyone utter a word. These children were afterward brought before the king and uttered the word "bekos" (baked bread). The same experiment was tried by Frederick II of Sweden and James IV of Scotland and by one of the Mogul emperors of India. Nothing conclusive was proved in either case. The Persians claim that Arabic, Persian and Turkish are the three primitive languages. Their tradition says that the serpent that tempted Eve spoke Arabic, the most persuasive language in the world. Adam and Eve spoke Persian, the most poetic language of all, and the angel Gabriel spoke Turkish, the most menacing language. Scholars formerly agreed that Sanscrit was the oldest tongue but later discoveries suggest that it too is derived from some still more ancient speech.

Superstition Lingers

Even in this day and age there are some people in England who believe in witches. Burning the Clavie, an ancient custom, of which the object is to free the inhabitants of the city from witches for another year, is still celebrated at Burghead. Blazing emfluing through open doors of houses to burn up the witches.

TASTY LITTLE SARDINE

The little silvery herring which we call sardine comes from the coast of Maine.

We do not serve this delightful little fish often enough to learn of the number of dishes which it may add to our list of good things. How about a rarebit? Everybody likes rarebit.

Sardine Rarebit.—Mix two tablespoonfuls of melted butter with half a pound of rich cheese grated or broken into bits. Stir constantly while it melts, then add one egg beaten and diluted with two-thirds of a cupful of cream. Stir until smooth, season with paprika, a small pinch of salt and a few drops of tabasco sauce. Drain a box of sardines, broil them on slices of toast and pour over the hot rarebit. Serve at once.

One may buy the sardines put up in oil, or in tomato sauce, or "done" in mustard, so all tastes may be served and given a variety.

Curried Sardines.—Mix one teaspoonful each of sugar and curry powder, adding a pinch of salt. Put these into a saucepan with one cupful of cream and a teaspoonful of lemon juice. Stir until hot, then drop in a dozen sardines. In another pan heat some butter, and in it saute slices of bread large enough to hold a sardine and a slice of apple. Pour some of the hot apple sauce over each and serve.

Sardine sandwiches are probably the most popular way of serving this little fish, next to serving them as they come from the tin, with a bit of lemon and bread and butter. How would you like to try:

Sardines on Toast.—This is a most delightful dish for Sunday night supper or in fact for any day in the week. Put two tablespoonfuls of butter in a saucepan, add two tablespoonfuls of flour, stir until smooth and browned slightly, then add a half cupful of good soup stock; stir until thick, add a cupful of sardines from which the skin and bones have been removed and serve over rounds of hot buttered toast.

SEASONABLE GOOD THINGS

The season is here when porch and garden parties call for all the ingenuity and originality which each hostess possesses, to make the occasion a pleasant one.

A teaspoonful of fresh grated orange or lemon rind added to the pot of tea will add a flavor which reminds one of the rare and expensive blends.

Loaf sugar rubbed over the rind of a lemon or orange will absorb much of the essential oil and thus when dropped into the hot tea adds a pleasant flavor. Rub the surface of the lemon or orange with a coarse grater at first to break the oil cells, then use the sugar quickly.

Icebox cookies are always in season, but especially so during the warm weather. Try making them and keeping them in the icebox for a week or more, baking a baking sheet of them occasionally, then they will always be crisp and fresh to the taste.

Lemon Icebox Cookies.—Cream one cupful of butter or a mixture of butter and other sweet fat, add one and one-half cupfuls of sugar, when well blended add three beaten eggs, two tablespoonfuls of lemon juice, one teaspoonful of the grated rind, five cupfuls of flour, one-half teaspoonful of salt, four teaspoonfuls of baking powder, all well blended in the flour. Add candied orange peel, chopped nuts; raisins may be added to taste. Shape into rolls and place in the ice box. Cut into thin slices and bake in a quick oven.

Graham Fruit Bars.—Mix one-half teaspoonful of salt, one cupful each of white and graham flour, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, three-eighths cupful of cold water, one-half cupful of shortening, one teaspoonful of lemon juice; more water may be needed to make a stiff dough. Add the following: One-half cupful each of chopped pitted dates, figs, raisins, walnuts, and one-fourth of a cupful of sugar, the grated rind and juice of a large orange; there should be one-fourth of a cupful of the fruit juice. Roll out and fit to the bottom of large baking pans. Make a filling of the nuts, raisins and fruit juice with sugar; mix well and spread one-fourth of an inch thick over the sheet of dough; cover with another layer. Bake 20 minutes in a hot oven. Cut into bars and cool.

Fruit Nectar.—Mix one quart of water and two cupfuls of sugar, boil ten minutes. Cool, add two cupfuls of grape fruit cut into bits, the juice of four lemons and four oranges. Freeze to a mush, add the stiffly beaten white of one egg and one cupful of cherry pulp, continue freezing, then serve from punch bowl or as sherbet.

Lesson for July 6

ABRAHAM, A PIONEER OF FAITH

LESSON TEXT—Genesis 12:1-3; 13: 1-12; 14:14-16; 17:1-8; Heb. 11:8-10.

GOLDEN TEXT—By faith Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Pleasing God by Obedience.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Abraham, the Pioneer.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Pioneering in an Unknown Country.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—A Man Who Found Friendship with God.

I. Abraham's Call (12:1).

Abraham's ancestors were idolatrous. God came unto him in Ur of the Chaldees and said unto him,

1. "Get thee out of thy country." It was necessary for him to break the strong attachments which bound him.

2. Get thee out "from thy kindred." He was not only to leave behind him his native land, but his relatives as well. His kindred being idolaters, he must separate himself from them.

3. "Into a land that I will show thee." He was not told what or where the land was.

II. God's Covenant with Abraham (12:2, 3; 17:1-8).

1. What God promised to Abraham. (1) To make him the father of a great posterity (v. 2). This has been literally fulfilled. (2) To make his name great (v. 2). No name in all history equals that of Abraham in its honorable influence. It is revered among Jews, Mohammedans and Christians. They all acknowledge him as father. (3) A blessing to others (vv. 2, 3). He was not only to become great and share God's blessings, but to be a blessing to others.

2. The land given unto him (17:8). Although Abraham was a pilgrim, he was permitted to sojourn in the land. The land itself was given to his seed, Israel—God's chosen and most favored nation. The nation to which He came nearest and gave most, in order that it might pass on his goodness to the other nations of the world, was given the most strategic position in the earth.

While the Hebrews have failed in the fulfillment of their divinely appointed task and the world is in chaos because of it, they shall go back to their old land and fulfill their divinely appointed task.

III. Abraham's Generous Treatment of Lot (13:1-12; 14:14-16).

While Abraham sojourned in Egypt, having gone there because of the famine in Canaan, he grew rich in worldly goods. Because of his deception of the king, he was thrust out of Egypt when the truth became known.

1. Abraham and Lot separate (vv. 5-12).

Seeing that their temporal relations would engender strife and provoke quarreling, and knowing the disastrous effect upon the heathen round about, Abraham gave Lot his choice. Though Lot owed everything to Abraham, his selfish heart moved him to grasp for the best, and his decision ultimately brought him to grief. He prospered for awhile, but eventually not only his goods, but he himself and his family were taken away by the confederate kings who came against Sodom.

2. Abraham delivers Lot (14:14-16). Though Lot's trouble was the fruit of his own sowing, Abraham's magnanimity of soul moved him to take up arms and deliver Lot from the oppressor. While Lot suffered from his selfish choice, Abraham prospered.

IV. Abraham's Faith (Heb. 11:8-10).

1. Its source (v. 8).

The word of God. Faith takes God at His word.

2. Its practice (vv. 9, 10).

Abraham never settled down, even in the land of promise. He was a true pilgrim. He was content to pass through the land because his eyes were fixed on "a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God."

V. Abraham Tested (Heb. 11:17-19).

1. At the command of God he offered up Isaac (v. 17).

He went out from the country in obedience to God. He laid down his son on the altar in obedience to God.

2. The promise of blessing was wrapped up in Isaac (v. 18).

The promise involved this particular child, not just any descendant.

3. The supreme venture (v. 19).

He so completely trusted God that he went all the way. He believed that God would raise up Isaac from the dead in order to make good His promise.

One of His Heroes

To go on cheerfully with a petty round of little duties, little avocations, to smile for the joy of others when the heart is aching . . . who does this, his works will follow him. He may not be a hero to the world, but he is one of God's heroes.—Doctor Farrar.

Asking God's Guidance

There is nothing so small but that we honor God by asking his guidance in it, or insult Him by taking it into our own hands.—John Ruskin.

Fish and Game Club Information

Fisheries: The production of the hatcheries this season has been extraordinarily good. Already the distribution and planting of bass fingerlings has begun, and it is quite certain that practically all requests for fish, numbering nearly 2,000, will be filled by fall.

In the public waters the spawning of bass is reported to have been exceptionally good, and generally to have been finished, due to excellent conditions of weather and water.

The four crews engaged in removing undesirable fish from public waters continue to report substantial catches, though not in such numbers as earlier in the year.

Propagation of Game Birds: At the Brown County State Game Reserve the hatching of pheasant and turkey eggs has been completed, and we now have within the enclosures about 2,000 young pheasants and about 150 young turkeys. There has been very little loss of birds, even though the weather has been warm and dry.

It is regretted that some of the sportsmen's organizations did not receive pheasant eggs until very late, and it is likely for that reason, the best results will not be obtained. We apologize for the delay, which was due to the failure of the dealers to ship seasonably.

Mussels: This office has had many inquiries whether any waters, heretofore closed against taking mussels, will be opened soon. Also petitions have been filed asking that certain waters be opened. It is deemed advisable to publish in this bulletin that the department does not intend to remove the restrictions on any closed water, and that the regulations of the department will continue in force for the full prescribed period.

Mammals: Mr. M. W. Lyon, Jr., who has been engaged by this department to prepare a book on mamals of Indiana, is asking for information concerning certain animals.

Tagged Fishes: The State of Illinois recently tagged several hundred fishes in the Ohio river, for the purpose of obtaining data on migration and growth. The tags are of metal clamped to the base of the tail and bear a number on one side and the letters INHS on the other. Any fisherman who catches any such fish should notify David H. Thompson, Zoologist, State Natural History Survey Division, Urbana, Ill. Returns on Spoonbill cat are especially desired.

Warden Service: In May there were 205 arrests by wardens, resulting in 181 convictions, 18 cases pending, 8 cases dismissed, and fines and costs amounting to $4410.40. Among the offenses were 80 for hunting, fishing or trapping without license, 57 for use or possession of nets, traps and spears, and 52 for taking or possession of game fish in close season.

Walter Shirts,
Supt. Fisheries and Game.

MANY ARSON CASES ARE REPORTED

Alfred Hogston, State Fire Marshal, has issued the following statement in regard to the Indiana State Fire Marshal Department activities for the six month period from January 1st to July 1st, 1930.

The Arson Division has been unusually active, due to the great number of fires of suspicious origin. 113 such fires were investigated, and 10 were re-investigated for new evidence. There were 10 confessions of arson secured, and 15 arrests made. Of the cases taken to court, 6 convictions were secured. There were 3 acquittals and 1 jury disagreement.

In the Inspection Division for the same period of time there were 1106 inspections of property for fire hazards. 136 new orders were issued as the result of such inspections. There were 589 compliances on orders, leaving 388 orders yet pending.

Mr. Hogston said, "There have been an unusual number of arson cases and fires of suspicious origin in the last six months, and evidence indicates that in at least ninety per cent of such cases the motive was to collect the insurance. And further, in practically every case the property was over-insured."

FACTS CONCERNING NEW YORK CITY

Our greatest city—New York—sees many strange things every day. Here are some of them:

Ten times each hour a child is born in New York.

Once every thirteen minutes there is a wedding.

Every fourteenth minute, day and night, there is a funeral held.

A train enters the city every forty-two seconds. The freight cars leaving New York will fill eight tracks reaching from New York to San Francisco.

Two hundred and sixty-six trainloads of food, or a number that would reach from New York to Philadelphia, are needed to feed the people of the city for a week.

It takes five hundred million gallons of water each day to satisfy this great city. If this amount of water were divided up in quarts it would give a quart to every man, woman and child on the face of the earth.

There are more than twice as many people riding on the subway, and the elevated and the surface cars, as ride on all the steam railroads of the whole nation put together.

More than one-third of the population of the United States entered the Grand Central Station last year.

There are 36,383 more people in New York than there are in Washington State, Oregon, Idaho, Utah, Colorado, Arizona, New Mexico, Montana, Wyoming, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska and Nevada.

During 1920, 778,749 persons arrived in the United States, and so well did 415,722 like New York that they stayed there.

If the streets of New York were placed end to end they would reach to San Francisco and half-way back again. The parks and playgrounds would cover more than 8,703 acres.

There are enough Italians in the city to make a city the size of Los Angeles; one the size of Milwaukee could be populated by Austrians from New York. The Irish would fill two cities the size of Baltimore and Albany.

It costs New York two hundollars every day for the education of its children in the public schools.

There are seventeen million books taken from the libraries every year.

Beggars Can Choose

By MARGARET WEYMOUTH JACKSON

Art is a jealous mistress. The difficulty with which Ernestine adjusts her own desires to the consuming flame of Will's genius is absorbing. Ambition culminates in drama, a great disgrace threatens, a sacrifice is made. The author frankly loves her characters and makes you share this genuine affection.

THE BEST BOOSTER FOR YOUR BUSINESS IN DeKALB COUNTY

ST. JOE NEWS.

NEWS MAKES A GOOD PAPER, SO SEND IT IN TO US.

VOL. XLIV | ST. JOE, DeKALB COUNTY, INDIANA, THURSDAY, JULY 10, 1930 | NUMBER 28

THE MARATHON ENDED JULY FIRST

Arthur Tudball and Emma Alwes, both of Indianapolis won the grand prize of $1,000 in the dance marathon which started in the National Guard Armory the night of April 9 and which came to an end shortly before midnight Tuesday night, July 1. They were known as couple No. 13-1.

The winners of the grand prize established what is claimed to be a new world's record for marathoning under rules which require the contestants to be on the floor 45 minutes out of every hour, allowing only 15 minutes for a rest period. They went 1,994 hours, dancing an extra hour after the withdrawal of the next to the last team on the floor, couple No. 35 comprising Early Aulby and Norah Cravens, both of Indianapolis. Aulby and Miss Cravens won $500.

Forty-seven couples began the endurance grind which lasted for 83 days.

The three other prizes were won by John Harrison, Wellsville, O., and Gladys Nichelson, Canton, O., who get $250; Drag Harlan, Los Angeles, Cal., and Rose Eckley, Detroit, $150, and Dan Salisbury, Chicago, and Dorothy Hopkins - McWilliams, Dayton, O., $100.

THE PRESS ENTERTAINED AT IRENE BYRON

The Irene Byron Tuberculosis Sanatorium, as seen by the visiting public and patients July 4th, ranks among the best equipped institutions of its kind in the world. Every year the visiting public is shown new additons, new facilities, and new methods of treatment based upon new discoveries in science.

The buildings of this institution are all brick and steel, fire proof construction, joined together by underground passages for winter use and in some instances, joined together by surface passages. A new addition has been completed which facilitates private rooms for patients, equipped with shower bath, which insures better sanitation.

The children's building has the appearance of a home, individual miniature furniture and playthings and swimming pool and the pastime grounds.

The patients rooms are equipped with steel furniture, beds with springed mattresses, electric clocks and fans, and sanitary thermos drinking bottles and all facilities that will add to the comfort of the patients.

Both residences, for men and women, have recreation halls, equipped with pool tables and reading rooms for the idle hours. The meals are prepared by dietary experts in improved kitchens and conveyed to the various departments by oven tight, steel vehicles.

The medical departments are composed of X-ray and artificial sun ray laboratories (for winter use,) dental and eye, ear and throat clinics, operating rooms which take care of all the medical requirements of their guests, in addition to the regular tubercular treatments. The education of the children is provided for by a teachers staff which guarantees the child a chance after the cure is perfected.

At the present time there are 180 guests or patrons taking treatment, many of which, seem to be in perfect health, moving about and in the best of spirits.

This institution had contracts with fourteen counties of this state, namely: Adams, Elkhart, Howard, Huntington, Lagrange, Miama, Noble, Porter, Stenben, Wabash, Wayne, Wells and Grant, and with Ball Brothers institution. These contracts keep the sanatorium filled to capacity.

Doctors state that the causes of tubercular trouble was accesses in habits and were in most part occupational. The lack of proper exercise, good air, absence of good morals and over indulgence of hilarity and late hours and irregular rest periods were the main causes of the breaking down of the body resistance necessary to health.

Tuberculosis is curable. From the best information, based on the investigation and personal experience of the leading sanatorium physicians of the world, it is obvious that the problem to be faced by a person who has tuberculosis and who proposes making a fight is grave, indeed. And is it a small matter to impress the patient that such gravity is in his case. There is no chronic disease requiring more persistant and watchful care. During the last few years the ideas with regard to tuberculosis have been completely revolutionized. Tuberculosis can be cured if treatment is begun at the proper time and carried out under the proper conditions. There is no seerious disease so curable as pulmonary tuberculosis, if treated in time and there is none more hopeless, if rteated too late or by improper methods.

Nothing is more falacious than the belief that climate is an important factor in the treatment of T B and that the atmospheric features of this or that specific climate are the curing elements for T. B. It is not so much climate as it is good air and good scientific treatment under scientific and learned methods. Cold air is exhilerating and experience proves that the greatest imporvement takes place between late fall and early spring. Everything is done to make the sanatorium life one of pleasure and joy in the thoughts of getting well again.

OBITUARY

Harvey Kimes, son of George and Sarah Boyer Kimes was born on the old homestead east of Spencerville on August 21, 1852. Of eleven brothers and sisters, he was the last to pass away. In 1877 he was united in marriage to Rachael Hart through which union two children were born, one of whom survives, Mrs. Pluma Houser, of Waynesboro, Pa. Three grandchildren also survive, Helen, Max and Barr Houser.

About eleven years ago he moved from Spencerville to St. Joe where he lived until last January. For the past three months he has lived with his daughter in Pennsylvania.

His health has been failing for several years, and through much suffering he was patient. Thru the influence of Rev. Rediger of Fort Wayne he found created within him christian convictions of life and death whereby he passed away in faith and hope on the fifth day of July at the age of 77 years, 10 months, and 14 days.

The funeral was held Tuesday afternoon at 3 o'clock from the Lutheran Church, Spencerville, with Rev. Stoll officiating. Burial in White City cemetery.

COBURN'S CORNERS - HOME-COMING

You are cordially invited to attend the annual Home-Coming of the Coburn's Corners Church of Christ to be held next Sunday, July 13.

The regular Sunday School and church service will be held in the forenoon, with J. O. Rose, of Angola, the speaker.

A pot luck dinner will be served at the noon hour.

The main speaker for the afternoon will be Dr. J. Raymond Schutz, of North Manchester College. Dr. Schutz is the newly elected president of the Indiana Council of Religious Education. No speaker on the platform today is more popular than Dr. Schutz. Come and hear him, there is a treat in store for you.

The Spencerville Orchestra will furnish the music. Other special numbers will be rendered for your entertainment.

Come and enjoy these good things with us.

W. Lehr Wilder,
Chairman.

A wedding announcement was received Thursday by Mrs. Chas. Kock, stating that on July 2nd., Ruby Lorene Portteus, of Raub, Indiana, a former school teacher at this place, and C. Allen Minor, were married at the bride's home and that after August 1st., they would be at home at 3951 Cleveland Ave., San Diego, Calif.

ST. JOE WINS PAIR OVER THE FOURTH

The St. Joe Independents defeated the Butler Yanks July 4th at Butler 20-3.

The game was close until the fourth inning when St. Joe got to Gaff for ten runs. Ridge replaced Gaff and St. Joe collected ten more runs to make their total of 20. Beams hit a homer for St. Joe.

Battery for Avilla: Kelham, Ridge; for St. Joe: Sapp, Blair, Kinsey, Richmond.

St. Joe bunched four hits in the fourth inning to take a 4-1 game from Avilla Sunday, July 6.

This game was a pitcher battle Blair and Croy, each allowing four hits.

Batery for Avilla: Kelham, Croy; for St. Joe: Sapp, Blair.

Next Sunday Avilla comes to St. Joe. Lets all turn out for this game for it promises to be a duplicate of last Sunday's game which happened to be a real game.

OFFICERS MAKE RAID AT NEWVILLE

Dallas Cook, 30, of Newville was arrested Saturday night charged with possession of liquor when officers made a raid and found nine pints of moonshine, 107 empty pint bottles and an empty gallon jug.

Cook smashed a pint bottle of moonshine which he had in a pocket against the fender of Sheriff Armstrong's car in an effort to destroy evidence. He then started to run, but the officers found the liquor hidden in the grass at Cook's home.

Assisting Sheriff Armstrong in the raid were Deputy Sheriff Art Zimmerman, Chief of Police Charles Davis and Henry West, night policeman of Auburn.

Arraigned before Judge Endicott Monday afternoon, Cook pleaded guilty. He was fined $100 and costs and was sentenced to the penal farm for 90 days.

Cook was in federal court at Fort Wayne several months ago on a like charge and drew a suspended sentence.

TO HARVEST WITH COMBINE

Harry Shull of near Auburn, will harvest his 112 acres of wheat and thresh it at the same time this year. Mr. Shull is the owner of the first combine harvester and thresher in the county and is one of the few fermers in Indiana owning one.

The combine is operated by two men, one for the tractor and the other for the harvester-thresher. The entire outfit takes the place of from 12 to 18 men. It cuts from 20 to 25 acres of grain in a day, threshes it and the grain is carried to a 30 bushel tank at the top of the machine under which the wagons are run to be loaded.

The machine does the work in a much shorter time than the ordinary method of harvesting at less expense. With it the operator may scatter the straw over the fields or pile it in wind rows to be hauled to the barn. The weed seeds are separated from the grain by a special process and are conveyed into sacks to be burned.

Last reports from Sam Keesler, who is in the hospital at Auburn suffering with blood poison in his right foot, is, that he is on the road to recovery. Monday he sat up in bed for a time, the first for some time. He has lost flesh, but as soon as he begins to have relief, he will soon return to normal.

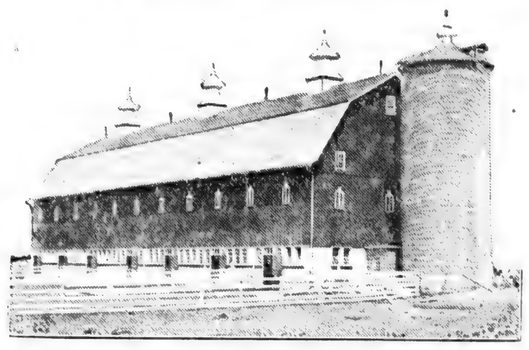
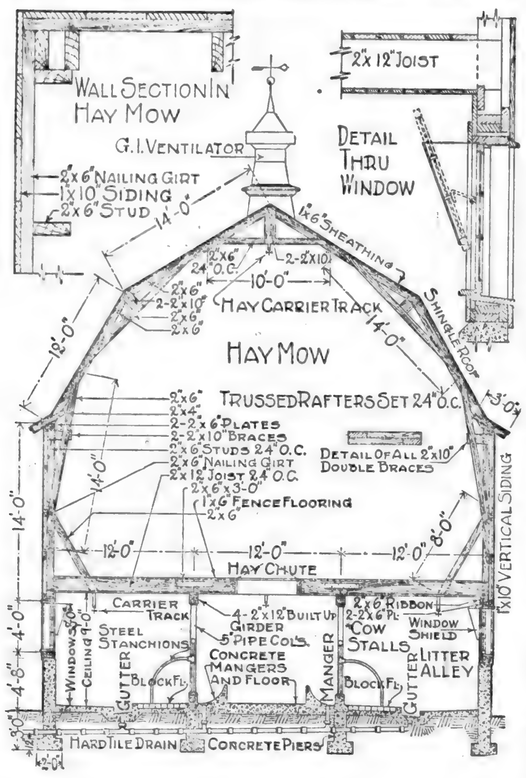
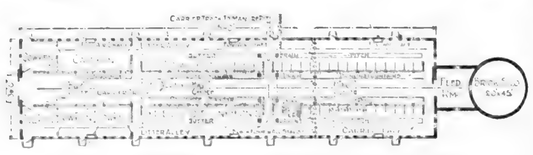
Modern Daylight Dairy Barn Has Proven Profitable Investment







By W. A. RADFORD

Mr. William A. Radford will answer questions and give advice FREE OF COST on all problems pertaining to the subject of building work on the farm, for the readers of this paper. On account of his wide experience as editor, author and manufacturer, he is, without doubt, the highest authority on the subject. Address all inquiries to William A. Radford, No. 407 South Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill., and only inclose two-cent stamp for reply.

Modern farm buildings are more than just structures to house livestock and crops. They are designed so that the necessary work of caring for the animals and of storing the crops can be performed easily; they are equipped so that health and productivity of the animals are kept at the highest point.

The investment in modern buildings is looked upon as one which will, over a period of years, repay the cost of the structures and return profit to the owner. In connection with this is shown the illustration of a modern daylight dairy barn, which has stood the test of experience and has proven that it is profitable to make an investment in it. Of course, the size of the building to be erected depends upon the need of the owner, but in architectural design this design is correct and may be built either larger or smaller as the size of the farm and size of the herd of live stock will permit.

The building illustrated is modern in every respect and is constructed in such a way as to cut down the labor of the farm.

The difference between profit and loss in handling a dairy herd depends upon two things. First, cows which have an annual milk production of sufficient quantity to return the profit over the cost of feed are required. Second, to reduce the labor cost of caring for the herd to a point where the milk checks will more than compensate for the feed and labor.

Cows to be the most productive must be housed so that the feed they consume will go into milk rather than into heat to maintain their bodies. Milk brings a better price in cold weather than in warm and as a consequence where something like summer temperatures are maintained in the dairy stable, the cows are the most productive. In order to do this, stables are designed so that temperatures in winter may be maintained without much variation and at the same time the animals can be supplied with a constant flow of fresh air. Line breeding for production makes the modern pure-bred dairy animal more susceptible to disease and as a consequence buildings are designed to insure their health. A system of ventilation which will carry out the moisture the animals are constantly throwing off and replace the dead, damp air with fresh, dry air, is necessary.

It will be noted by the floor plan shown in connection with this dairy barn, that a number of pieces of equipment which will cut down the labor in the dairy stable are indicated. In this barn the stalls face a center feeding alley. Overhead is a carrier track which runs to the feed mixing room adjoining the silo. This is an easy method of transporting the feed to the mangers at the stall heads. This same track extends over the litter alley for the removal of litter. Stanchions are of the modern, sanitary, steel type with drinking cups between each two stalls so that a constant supply of fresh water is available to the animals. The floor of the stable is of concrete with the mangers and gutters built into the floor. Also shown in connection with the floor plan is a cross section of the building which shows some of the details of construction and specifies the dimensions of the materials used.

Building Material Man Always Ready to Help

About the best advice anyone could give an inexperienced home seeker would be "go to a building material dealer."

He knows all building materials and their use. He sells all worthy materials, so he is prejudiced in favor of none.

His interest is to see you get the right materials and enough of them to build a house that will be comfortable and long lasting. His advice is worth while.

No one need build or buy a home now without this information and protection. Material dealers, good builders and wise home seekers are co-operating in this movement for better and safer home building.

Ventilating Unit for More Expensive Homes

Ventilating units are just as essential in the homes as in the factories, laundries, theaters. A unit that has a powerful suction should be installed. Such an outfit will furnish a good movement of air throughout the house, especially if the ventilator is placed in an upstairs or attic window. By running the air-throwing machine for 15 or 20 minutes before retiring, sleeping rooms can be filled with clean, healthful air.

"This world that we are livin' in
Is mighty hard to beat;
We get a thorn with every rose,
But ain't the roses sweet?"

FRUIT DESSERTS

During the summer we begin with the luscious strawberry and serve it fresh with sugar and cream, over angel cake with cream, crushed over ice cream, and everyone likes the old-fashioned rich biscuit mixture for strawberry shortcake. The currant and cherry follow with raspberries and blackberries, so that one need not want for fruit desserts from early in the spring until the later fruits of autumn are ripe.

Blueberry Betty—Mix two cupfuls of soft bread crumbs (packed solidly) with one-half cupful of melted butter. Arrange in a buttered baking dish in alternate layers with two cupfuls of blueberries, sprinkle with two tablespoonfuls of sugar, a pinch of salt and a little lemon juice. Cover the top with crumbs and bake 20 minutes. Remove the cover and continue baking until the crumbs are brown. Serve with hot sweetened cream.

Orange Jelly With Strawberries—Prepare a ring mold filled with orange jelly to the depth of one-fourth of an inch. When set add strawberries cut into lengthwise slices over the jelly, adding more of the jelly to hold them in place; chill, repeat until the mold is filled. Chill, unmold on a serving platter and surround with billows of sweetened whipped cream flavored with orange. Fill the center with whole berries dusted with sugar.

Raspberry Charlotte Russe—Soak two tablespoonfuls of gelatin in one-third of a cupful of cold water, dissolve over hot water, cool slightly and add to one and one-half cupfuls of strained raspberry pulp and the juice, two-thirds of a cupful of sugar, one teaspoonful of orange extract. Set the dish in a bowl of chipped ice and stir constantly until the mixture begins to thicken, then fold in one and one-half cupfuls of heavy cream whipped until stiff. Turn into individual molds lined with thin slices of sponge cake. Chill and serve.

Blackberry Roll—Roll a rich biscuit dough one-fourth of an inch in thickness. Spread with fresh raspberry jam. Roll like a jelly roll, moisten the edges and press them together as securely as possible. Dip a cloth into boiling water, wring out in another cloth, dredge the hot cloth with flour and tie up the roll in the cloth, allowing room for rising. Cover with boiling water and cook two hours, or place in a steamer and steam one hour. Cover closely while cooking. Remove from the cloth to a hot platter and serve with cream and sugar or a foamy sauce.

Foamy Sauce—Cream one-half cupful of powdered sugar gradually, then add one egg well beaten and two tablespoonfuls of any fruit juice—orange, pineapple, or the blackberry will be just the one for the above recipe.

HOT WEATHER DISHES

Cocktails are always a refreshing beginner for a luncheon or dinner. During the warm weather the melons of various kinds make especially attractive cocktails or fruit salads. Scoop out the balls of melon using a small french potato cutter; serve with any sauce that appeals to the taste. A lemon sirup over muskmelon is well liked as is a ginger sirup, using some of the preserved ginger as a garnish.

Red Raspberry Whip—Set a bowl into a pan of crushed ice. Into the bowl put one and one-half cupfuls of ripe berries, one cupful of powdered sugar and the white of an egg. Beat with a wire egg beater until the mixture holds its shape. Pile lightly on a fancy glass serving dish and surround with fresh macaroons. Serve with a chilled boiled custard.

Junket in Cups—Heat a pint of milk until luke warm, add one-fourth of a cupful of sugar and a junket tablet, crushed and added to a tablespoonful of water. Flavor with one teaspoonful of vanilla. Turn into sherbet glasses and let stand in a warm place until set. Then chill. When ready to serve top each portion with a raspberry sauce.

Frozen Plum Pudding—Melt three squares of chocolate over hot water, add one-fourth cupful of sugar and one-fourth cupful of boiling water, stir and cook until smooth and glossy. Scald one quart of milk, one cupful each of heavy cream and one cupful of sugar in a double boiler. Add the chocolate mixture and a tablespoonful of vanilla, one junket tablet dissolved in one tablespoonful of cold water. Set the mixture in a warm place until it jellies. Add one-half pound of mixed fruits soaked over night in a thin sirup to cover, seeded raisins, shredded candied cherries, candied pineapple and shredded citron. Drain and pack in a fluted mold lined with lady fingers, cover and let stand in equal measures of ice and salt.

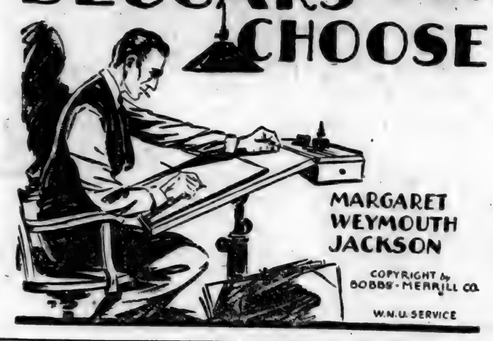
BEGGARS CAN CHOOSE



THE STORY

Renewing a childhood attachment, Ernestine Briceland, of a wealthy family, is attracted by Will Todd, newspaper artist, son of a carpenter.

She felt her horizon widening. What a world men lived in! Papa had his quarries, and Will his curlicues, and Loring his law! How wonderful to live in something, and for it! She felt that her own life was dim and futile. Now that she was out of school, she was expected to have a good time until she married. Will was the only man she knew outside the old familiar circle. How dull her interests were compared to his thrill over a twenty-five-dollar-a-week job.

"But, Will,"—she turned to him in such a manner that it seemed their faces would touch, drawn by the strong attraction that brought them so close—"I thought you were going to be a real artist."

"Ho," he said, "that's why I couldn't stand the Art institute! I want to be a cartoonist. I've discovered that you can do a whole lot more with a pencil line than make a petunia. I think you can make a line stand up and howl. You can make it do all sorts of things for you, caricature, design—nonsense. I don't want to be a color artist."

"But the birds you made for me, when you were only ten—the colors, and the way their heads bent—it's a beautiful book, Will. I showed it to my zoology teacher when I was in school, at Lake Forest, and he praised it. I wouldn't take anything for it."

Will brushed the birds aside impatiently.

"Kid stuff," he told her. "Have you seen these little shadow figures, just straight lines for body and limbs? You can get action into one of those things. Look here." He had been busy with a soft pencil on the edge of the stiff menu card, and he showed Ernestine now a sketch of a cat, sitting there looking at the fish list, licking his whiskers—a predatory hungry Tom. She laughed involuntarily, and her eyes filled with admiration.

"I see what you mean," she said. "It's a new kind of art, like jazz is a new kind of music. I know what you're trying to get at, and you do it, too. It's disrespectful though—don't you think?"

He was entranced with her understanding.

"Of course it's disrespectful," he said robustly. "Why not? I think the time has come for a little healthy disrespect. We'll show them."

He was very compelling. Ernestine's look of admiration was extravagant, and he was becoming a little drunk with it.

"I've done several column heads. You watch the first page of the second half of the Sun. I always put a little cat's head down in one corner of my stuff. We're not allowed to sign our things, but you can identify mine if you watch the paper. The fellows all encourage me, and my boss does, too."

He looked at her for a long moment and then exclaimed:

"Gosh, it's good to talk to you, Ernestine. You always did get right inside of my heart. I wasn't a bit surprised to see you. You may not believe me but all these years I've often thought I'd meet you. I never forgot that day you came to our house. I've often seen your shadow, sitting there in the kitchen eating bread and milk, and talking to mom. I remember I wanted to give you all my things—every one. You should have taken them. It would have made a lonely kid happy."

She was tender, remembering.

"I made an awful fuss because they dragged me to the lake that summer," she told him. "I wanted to stay in Chicago with you, and the practical difficulties of leaving a child behind did not interest me. We should have been together more. We were real friends."

"A boy never forgets kindness," he said soberly. "You were so good to me and always took my part."

"But, Will, you did something you never knew, for me. You told me one day a thing I've never forgotten. I thought your brace gave you a wonderful advantage, in the way of a lever to get your own will, and you scorned me for such a thought. It would be taking advantage, you said. I've never forgotten that. You were the one who taught me to be sporting."

The spell was cast. The mysterious bonds of spiritual understanding were forged.

"You're awf'ly pretty, Ernestine. You were a cute kid—but fat. I can remember what round cheeks you had. But now your cheeks slope down in that perfect line." He touched the line of her cheek with a tentative forefinger, then quickly withdrew his hand and flushed. "Dark eyes, dark hair and pale clear skin. What more could a girl want, unless it is such perfect bony structure? You'd be pretty anyway, dark or thin, or pale or flushed, because it's real—deep. Now you're blushing—and that gray coat." He laughed delightedly, and the deep color suffused Ernestine's cheeks at his personalities. But she was not displeased, only smiled at him.

"Aren't you glad we knew each other when we were kids?" he said to her. "It makes us seem so much closer now."

They swayed together and fell into a warm hypnotic silence. His little finger brushed her hand, as he knocked his ashes into the tray the waitress had placed for him, and at once they rose, talking and laughing artificially.

Ernestine felt the need to masquerade her bright joy in him. She was acting like a moon-struck high school girl, acting as though she had never talked to a man before. Well, she hadn't. Not like this, certainly. She had listened to plenty of them raving about themselves, and explaining the technicalities of football, but she had never taken part in such a satisfying conversation. But she dissembled as they left the tearoom and turned toward the newspaper plant.

It was dark now, and the streets were crowded with homegoing workers, so they instinctively drew close together. She asked after his mother in a formal tone.

"She'll never be well," he told her sorrowfully, and at once her sympathy drew them back into intimacy. He tried to put the conversation back into place.

"How's your pretty sister Lillian?"

She answered that Lillian was a beauty now, fair and slender and exquisite. A lady.

"She's going to marry Loring Hamilton, I guess," she said. "He's at the house a lot, as he's always been. He's awfully good to both of us, but Lillian's his choice. He's in his father's law office now. He inherited a nice practice. I believe he wants to be a judge. Don't you remember him?"

"A big blond boy? He was almost grown when we were kids. Yes, I remember him. He treated me with an air of weary patience. I hated him. He used to tease you and pull your hair. If he prefers Lillian, he's changed, for he always noticed you. I admit I was simply jealous. He had the run of the house, and I was an outsider and treated well only because I was a kid."

"Why, Will, that's not a bit nice of you to say," she protested, and he laughed good-naturedly. Both of them knew it was true.

"Is your mother just the same? She had such a pleasant voice, but she was bossy. Kind of a queen. I admired her tremendously. She fitted entirely my juvenile notions of a grand lady."

Ernestine laughed now.

"There's nobody like mamma for managing every one," she admitted.

They came to the Sun offices, and as they went in through the squirrel cage, the rhythmic crash of great presses came muffled to Ernestine's ears. Will took her over the whole place.

"Upstairs and downstairs, and in my lady's chamber," he said.

In the syndicate rooms he introduced her to half a dozen young men who were much impressed with her youth and beauty. He showed her the stool he sat on, the work on his board.

Mr. Peole came out and shook hands with her, and she was conscious of disappointment. He was a huge, untidy old man, with fat cheeks that had fallen a little, and a shiny bald head. But his eyes were intelligent, his voice was very kind. She felt that she might like him, if she could only know him.

Will's vanity seemed excessive. Although she knew he was proud to show her, he was none the less proud of himself. But it was like the vanity of a capable child, not at all displeasing. Not until they got into the street again did Ernestine realize that they had walked all over the big plant with their fingers interlaced. But she clung to him now shamelessly. He was such an old friend. She was filled with strong reluctance that this vivid hour should end.

He said goodby at the bus, without mentioning another meeting. Ernestine could not let it go at that.

"But you must come to see me," she said, as the conductor waited impatiently for her to board the bus. "I want to see you again, Will."

"Sure," he said vaguely. His mind had already gone back to work. "Sure. Call me up some day."

Ernestine went quickly along. Her feet were dancing, and her heart was dancing, too. She was extraordinarily happy and full of life. If only such an encounter could be a daily occurrence!

Some one was standing on their doorstep, watching her, waiting for her. She ran up the steps, and Loring Hamilton was there, big and fair and handsome, in his dark coat, with the fur collar.

"Hello, Lorrie. Have to rush in. I'm late. Are you just leaving?"

He looked down at her, the light from the drawing room window streaming on to his face, and Ernestine paused, surprised. She was filled with an inward dismay for she had never seen him like this. His face, usually complacent, was keen now, his blue eyes were brilliant sparks, his whole countenance quickened and fired. His voice, when he spoke again, had a barely perceptible quaver.

"Why were you running, Ernestine? You're still a kid half the time. When I heard you running, I knew it was you, because my heart began to run, too."

"Nonsense," said Ernestine briskly, but he was persistent.

"I was just going away, disappointed that I hadn't seen you, and here I have you alone for a moment at last. I've been wanting to tell you how beautiful you are, since you're grown. Where have you been? Your face is shining. I could see it luminous in the dark street. Ernestine—don't be silly. I'm trying to tell you I care for you—I—"

She pulled away from him with determination.

"You're the silly one," she said impatiently. "And dumb, as well." She passed him quickly, and closed the door behind her, shutting out his handsome, desirous face.

In her room, dressing for dinner, she was furious with him for intruding on the enchantment of her hour with Will. Didn't he know that he had made himself conspicuous, all last year, with his attentions to Lillian? He was not her lover. What was the matter with him?

Lillian came in from her room, which adjoined Ernestine's, and the younger sister looked at the elder one with old but ever-fresh admiration.

"Loring was kidding me," she told herself. "Of course he's crazy about Lillian."

Writer Has Long List of Rail Superstitions

Black cats are eyed with horror by railroad men, but dogs are considered lucky. Cross-eyed people avoid approaching American engine cabs because they are evil omens liable to be driven away with well-aimed lumps of coal.

Their proper function is to sit on the first seat of the rear coach, thereby conferring one day's luck on the conductor. As a matter of fact, while the engine driver is giving his steed a final inspection all adults who stare at him are considered unlucky unless they are accompanied by children.

Accidents on United States lines are believed to occur in triplets. An engineer who reports one is gloomy and despondent until he has worked off the spell by reporting two more.

Neither will any engineer who has not lost all interest in life cheerfully write "13 cars" on his report; he prefers to report "12 cars and an engine."

The brakeman supports the driver in his observance of superstitious rites by never carrying his lamp above his waist. To do so is considered fatal.

But the strangest of all tales of railway superstition is the story of the engine on the New York, New Haven and Hartford line. On the thirteenth of every month, no matter who he may be, the driver of that engine reports sick. The number of the engine is 0-13.—London Mail.

Date Set for Sessions

The Constitution provided that the congress should assemble March 4, 1789, and thereafter convene "in every year" on the first Monday in December unless it shall by law appoint a different day. Up to and including May 20, 1820, 18 acts were passed naming dates other than December. Since then, with few exceptions, congress has convened in December.

JACOB, A SELFISH MAN, TRANSFORMED

LESSON TEXT—Genesis 25:29-34; 28:18-22; 29:18-20; 33:1-4, 18.

GOLDEN TEXT—For what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?

PRIMARY TOPIC—Learning to Be Unselfish.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Learning to Be Unselfish.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—What Does It Mean to Be Honest?

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Learning from Experience.

I. Jacob's Birth (25:21-26).

In answer to Isaac's prayer, a seed was given unto him. Before Jacob's birth God revealed unto Rebekah the fact that he should have the place of pre-eminence. "The elder shall serve the younger." In this God reversed the ordinary law concerning the position of the elder son. The act of taking hold of Esau's heel as he was born, indicated Jacob's nature. The name Jacob means "supplanter."

II. Jacob's Schemes (25:27-34; 27:1-29).

1. He secured Esau's birthright (25:27-34).

It was right for Jacob to have the birthright since it was according to God's plan as revealed to Rebekah, but his scheme to get it was reprehensible. He took advantage of a brother's weakness to drive a sharp bargain.

2. Secured his father's blessing (27:1-29). (1) Was requested to get venison for his father. (2) Rebekah's scheme (vv. 5-33). It was God's plan that Jacob should be at the head, but He did not need the sin of Jacob and his mother to bring it about.

III. Jacob's Flight to Haran (ch. 28).

Jacob's deceit and cunning got him into trouble. He was compelled to flee from his outraged brother. He now began to reap what he had sown.

1. Jacob's vision at Bethel (28:10-15).

Jacob not only had to flee to save his life, but he had to leave home and mother. When night overtook him, he was obliged to sleep in a field with a stone for a pillow. It was under such circumstances that the Lord gave him the wonderful vision at Bethel. (1) He saw a ladder reaching from earth to heaven (v. 12). Jesus Christ is the ladder, connecting earth and heaven for us (John 1:51). (2) He saw angels of God upon the ladder (v. 12). These angels were divine helpers to render needed assistance along life's way. (3) The Lord standing above the ladder (vv. 13-17). To show Jacob that the ladder did not reach merely into space God appeared and talked with him. a. He declared that He was the God of Abraham and of Isaac, thus assuring Jacob that the same favor that was over his fathers was over him (v. 13). b. He renewed the covenant as to the land. Though Jacob was now fleeing from the land, the covenant would not fail. (v. 13). c. He assured him of a numerous seed (v. 14). d. The divine presence with Jacob (v. 15). Though he had sinned, God was with him. e. Jacob should be brought again into the land (v. 15).

2. Jacob's vow (vv. 18-22).

His vow included three things. (1) Dedication of himself to God (v. 12). (2) Establishment of worship (vv. 18, 19). (3) Consecration of his substance (v. 22).

IV. Jacob's Return to Canaan (chaps. 31-33).

1. The Lord instructs him (31:11-21).

Twenty years have elapsed since his experiences at Bethel. These years were spent in Padan-aram with his mother's people. Here he served Laban for twenty years. Though it was the purpose of God for him to return, he took clandestine leave of Laban. Laban pursued him in anger, but God appeared to Laban and forbade him to lay hands upon Jacob.

2. Jacob on the way (Gen. 32).

Though Jacob fled from Laban's pursuit, a more formidable enemy faced him in the person of Esau. (1) Jacob meeting the angels (v. 1). (2) Jacob praying (vv. 9-12). Not receiving a reply from Esau, Jacob cast himself upon God in prayer. (3) The angel wrestling with Jacob (vv. 24-32). He continued to wrestle until the approach of morning, not knowing that it was God in human form wrestling with him. God humbled him by dislocating his thigh. When thus humbled, he quit wrestling and clung to God. He got the blessing when he, conscious of his weakness, laid hold upon God. (4) A new name (v. 28). He was no longer Jacob, the "supplanter," but Israel, a "prince of God." His new name was given him after he had a new nature.

Finding God

If we cannot find God in your house or mine, upon the roadside or the margin of the sea, in the bursting seed or opening flower, in the day duty and the night musing, I do not think we should discern Him more in the grass of Eden or beneath the moonlight of Gethsemane.—James Martineau.

HISTORY'S MYSTERIES

Unsolved Riddles That Still Puzzle Authorities Here and Abroad

The Murder of Dr. Parkman

ONE of the most appalling murders ever committed in the United States was that of Dr. George Parkman, one of the wealthiest and best-known citizens of Boston, by Dr. John W. Webster, a professor of chemistry at Harvard university and a lecturer in the Medical college in Boston. This was a remarkable case not only because of the reputation of the murderer but also because of the mystery as to why a man of such marked intellect and of such high standing in his community and his profession should have been guilty of the crime for which he was executed.

There is no question that Doctor Webster deserved his fate, for the only excuse he had to offer was that of an ungovernable temper, but the records of crime contain few cases even remotely approaching this reversion to the brute by a man who was educated, cultured and refined in the extreme.

Doctor Parkman, the murdered man, was one of the founders of the Massachusetts Medical college and it was through his influence that Doctor Webster was chosen as a lecturer on chemistry at that institution. At the time, Doctor Parkman was a man of sixty years of age, with the most punctual of habits. Accordingly, when he did not return home one day at his usual hour, his family became alarmed, but no attempt at a detailed search was made until the following morning, while it was almost a week before any definite clew was located. It then became known that the missing man had had an appointment with Doctor Webster on the day he disappeared but, as Doctor Webster himself informed the police of this fact, no further importance was attached to it until it was discovered that Doctor Parkman had loaned Webster money upon two occasions and that the men had had several quarrels over the debts.

Doctor Webster was finally taken into custody, charged with at least a guilty knowledge of the crime and finally broke down and confessed, saying:

"He called me a scoundrel and a liar and continued to heap the bitterest taunts and epithets upon me. Then he showed me a letter congratulating him in securing my appointment as professor of chemistry and he fairly shrieked: 'I was the means of getting you your position and now I will get you out of it.'

"Then the doctor began heaping more threats and invectives upon me. At first I tried to pacify him, but it was of no avail, I forgot everything and, feeling nothing but the sting of his words, became excited to the highest degree of passion. When he thrust his fist into my face, I seized a heavy stick of wood and struck him with all the force that passion could lend me."

In his confusion, Doctor Webster told how the horror of his crime suddenly flashed upon him and, in a wild attempt to conceal the evidence of the murder, he removed the clothing from the body of the dead man and burned it. He then dismembered the body and disposed of it in a number of ways, believing that he had hidden all traces of the murder. But, in spite of his skill as a chemist, he was unable to hide all portions of the body and a sufficient amount of the remains were found to furnish the clew that led to his arrest and subsequent confession.

So plain were the facts in the case and so clear was Doctor Webster's statement of the manner in which he had acted that no attempt was made even to secure a reprieve. In full view of the college where he had taught, on a scaffold erected only a short distance from the house in which the murder had been committed, Doctor John White Webster paid the full penalty demanded by the law.

But an examination of the police annals of two continents fail to reveal an instance where a man of similar culture and education permitted himself to be overcome by his passions to the point of becoming a murderer—particularly since there was no excuse of his being under the influence of drugs or liquor. In fact, as one of the famous criminologists has stated: "The more we study the details of the Parkman murder, the more difficult it becomes to solve the mystery of the human emotions or to present any clear analysis of the reasons for men's instinctive actions."

Skin of Giant Snake

What is said to be the skin of the largest snake in the New world is in the Bronx Zoological park. This skin is twenty-two feet long and three feet wide. It is dark olive in color, marked with round dark spots, and belonged to an anaconda. Mr. Ditmars is quoted as saying that this specimen exceeds by seven feet the length of any snake he has seen in the New world.

Flying Dynamo

Have you ever considered that tiniest of feathered things, the humming bird? He's really an amazing creature in many ways aside from his minute dimensions, notes a writer in the Farm Journal. He has greater horse power per ounce than an airplane motor, and is probably the pluckiest fighter of all birds in defease of his nest.

On last Friday, July 4, the Hunter boys, Kenneth and John, decided to come down to earth again, although the engine was good for a few hours more. The on coming night and the possibility that their own physical endurance might not be equal to the occasion, they decided that 23 days was long enough to be away from mother earth. This flight of 553 hours, 41 minutes and 30 seconds surpassed the flight of the St. Louis Robin by 133 hours and 20 minutes which will give the next contendor for the endurance record something to think about. These endurance records, while calling for severe physical hardships, seem to be compensated by the honor the fliers receive and the financial consideration that provides for a couple of good farms and a little spending money on the side. But the crazé for notoriety is only a by product in the achievement—the scientific value to future aviation is the chief contribution that all endurance flights make. The knowing what a plane will do under strained conditions in a long flight is the main object of sponsoring such contests. Other benefits might be the encouragement of building better planes. After the record had been surpassed the contributions made to the fliers amounted to more than $4,000 per day.

The gossip writers in London are all agog over the news that Queen Mary indulges in a cigarette once in awhile. Of course, the common people naturally expect more from their superiors than from their every day contemporaries and some what more from royalty . In fact, the demands that all should live up to their professions. But in this and every other similar case we find that subjects and kings and queens alike come from the common place of life—are made up of human characteristics and are therefore distinctively human. It could be expected that a queen any more than a maid should be free from tobacco. If womanhood should be free from the vile weed then men should be free also. Since woman emancipation, she has become a strap hanger on the street car, an office seeker and holder. Since her invasion of the commercial avenues of life—the masculine chivalry that once guarded her spiritual self is now handed to her to reckon with herself. It now becomes necessary for every woman to look after herself. We remember that Queen Elizabeth tasted the first tobacco that was taken back from the colonies and she said that it was good. Are we to assume that a woman was the first to taste all forbidden fruit before she handed it to man? Chastity or sanctity of the descendents of Ma Eve must be settled by the descendents of Ma Eve. The gift of opportunity and privilege has its accompaning pit falls. Women will be what women make them.

The recent death of Dr. A. Conan Doyle, famous spiritualist leader and creator of Sherlock Holmes, took place at his home in Sussex, England, on Monday. Besides being a spiritualist, he was an author of some note. The family is expecting a message from their father as soon as he arrives in the other world and gets things organized and learns the new methods necessary to communicating from the grave to this world. He spoke of the world beyond as "summer land." The family said that they had no prearranged code to communicate ftom rhe other side but they believe that he will be resourceful enough to effect a message in any nvent. It will be remembered that certain individuals have made arrangements for sending messages from the great beyond after death and others have installed radio sets in their caskets to be able to tune in on the world and let the gay world have a glimpse of their future home—wherever that is—by radio of personal messages but up to the present time we do not have any record where any messages have been received. There is no doubht but what makes spiritualism popular among certain classes is the fact that people are incurably religious and they have an inherent desire to learn about the mysterious ,the nature of their lives and the way they live seems to make it necessary for them to look into the future to learn just what is next. Its a noticable feature that the element of faith is not found o be in the system of spiritualism. The element of doubt seems to be the mother of the sex—the inquiring into the mysterious unknown.

HOME COMING DAY AT THE WINONA LAKE BIBLE CONFERENCE

The detailed program of the Winona Lake Bible Conference is in print, and all things are satisfactory for the opening on August 15th of what those Winonans acquainted with program building believe to be the best and biggest Conference yet held in connction with this justly famous institution. The most noted preachers and Bible teachers of the world have been secured.

Here is a list of the speakers and the dates on which they will speak. Dr. Alexander Thompson of Canterbury, England, August 15 to 18; Lionel B. Fletcher, Australia's leading evangelist, August 20 to 24; Dr. Robert G. Lee, August 22 to 24; Dr. O. F. Bartholow, August 23 and 24; Dr. J. C. Massee, August 15 to 24; Clinton T. Howard, August 15 and 16; Dr. Max Reich, August 15 and 16; Dr. I. M. Margett, August 19 to 21; Dr. George McNeely, August 15 to 19; President John McNaugher, August 15 to 19; Dr. R. B. Kuiper, August 19 and 20; Dr. George L. Robinson, August 15 to 19; Dr. Herbert Beiber, August 20 to 24.

Home Coming Day is to be August 21st. The special feature this year when Lionel Fletcher, of Australia will bring the message in the big Tabernacle seating 7,000; after which on the lawn under the big oaks reminiscences by the old time Winonans will be indulged in.

Clinton T. Howard, known as the "little giant," will speak in the Tabernacle the first Sunday afternoon, August 15th, on "Bootlegging the Constitution," and Dr. O. F. Bartholow, famous preacher from New York, will hold forth on the last Sunday afternoon, August 24th.

At the close of the Conference Sunday night, August 24th, at 9 o'clock, a union communion service will be held. Detailed program and special information may be secured by writing to Dr. W. E. Biederwolf, Winona Lake, Indiana.

AUTO INDUSTRY ON THE UP-GRADE

The Auditor of the Automobile department has made his report to Otto G. Fifield, Secretary of State, revealing the number of licenses issued for the first six months of 1930, also the cash receipts for the nine months of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930.

During the first six months of 1930, there were, all told, 830,644 licenses issued as compared with 816,784, issued during the first six months in 1929, an increase of 13,860. There were 50,207 chauffeur licenses issued as against 36,221 issued in 1929, an increase of 13,986. The year's business will not fall far short of a million licenses issued.

The receipts for the nine months in 1929, were $5,830,070.91 as compared with $6,033,966.66, in 1930, an increase of $208,895. There is an increased activity in the license department indicating that the sale of new cars is improving and the following fiscal year will show that the automobile business is on the up grade.

There was a decrease in the receipts in the auto theft department owing to the slowing down of the manufacture and sale of new cars. In the fiscal year 1929 for a period of nine months the receipts were $194,453.50, while for the fiscal year of 1930, covering a period of nine months the receipts were $162,420.10, a deficit of $32,033.40. This is the first year that a like condition ever occurred in the theft department.

HISTORY'S MYSTERIES

Unsolved Riddles That Still Puzzle Authorities Here and Abroad

Why Were the Witches Burned?

WHO was responsible for the beginning of the "witchcraft mania" which spread over the Massachusetts colony in the latter part of the Seventeenth century, as a result of which nineteen innocent persons were executed and hundreds imprisoned and tortured?

No one has ever been able satisfactorily to explain this phenomenon, save on the ground of religious hysteria, founded upon the line from Exodus which states "Thou shalt not permit a witch to live"? But the real beginning of the American witchcraft delusion has never been discovered, except for the fact that in 1692 Rev. Samuel Parris noted that his daughter Elizabeth, aged nine, and his niece, Abigail Williams, aged eleven, were "acting strangely," as he phrased it. The children developed the habit of creeping under tables, uttering peculiar noises and otherwise disturbing the calm of the Puritan settlement—peculiarities which would hardly be noticed at the present time but which the Colonists considered as manifestations of the power of the devil.

In view of the general belief in witchcraft, supported by the decisions of some of the greatest legal authorities of England implying the existence of witchcraft and indicating the various degrees with which it might be practiced, the young girls were not punished for mischievous conduct, but were pitied as the victims of the evil one and urged to give the names of the humans who had acted as the emissaries of Satan. Finally, after continued pressure from their elders, they blamed an Indian slave named Tituba; Goody Osborn, a bed-ridden woman whose mind was afflicted by many troubles, and Sarah Grand, a forlorn and friendless creature who was looked upon as being little better than a vagrant.

After a prolonged examination of the children, Doctor Griggs, a local physician, declared that they were not suffering from any ordinary or physical ailment, but that they were possessed by the devil, "undoubtedly projected by the persons whom they named." Viewing the whole matter in the light of present-day knowledge, it is practically certain that the three women had had nothing to do with the "strange" actions of the children, but the public mind was so superstitious and susceptible at the time that almost the entire settlement lent willing ears to the story of the "possessed ones" and, in March, 1692, the preliminary trial of the suspected witches was held.

As was only natural, the accused did not receive fair treatment. No counsel was allowed to plead for them and the judge even bullied them in order to force a confession of their dealings with Satan. The children asserted that they were in intense pain whenever they looked at the "witches" and that they had also been choked, beaten and pinched by the three women in order to make them more amenable to the mandates of the evil one. Who prompted this evidence or through what delusion it had become fixed in their mind, the writers on the witchcraft period at Salem have never been able to throw any light—save that it was probably founded on nothing more than a childish fondness for holding the center of the stage, coupled by the ideas which had been literally forced upon them by their elders.

But their account of the "witchcraft" was believed and the excitement it caused spread like a forest fire. Hundreds of persons of both sexes were accused of having had intercourse with Satan and were thrown into prison. Nineteen were hanged; one, an aged man, was pressed to death, and two more died in prison before the witchcraft madness had run its course.

Finally, the Colonists awoke to the horror of their delusion and bitterly repented their stringent measures to put down the "forces of darkness" as they were alluded to, but it was a long time before the public mind entirely recovered from its witchcraft paralysis, apparently induced by nothing more than the strange actions of two children.

Penitent—I have stolen a fat goose from a poultry yard!

Priest—That is very wrong.

Penitent—Would you like to accept it, father?

Priest—Certainly I will not receive stolen goods—return it to the man from whom you stole it.

Penitent—But I have offered it to him and he won't have it.

Priest—In that case you may keep it yourself.

Penitent—Thank you, father.

The priest arrived home to find one of his own geese stolen.—Hummel, Hamburg.

The Low-Down on Storms

Recent meteorological investigations show that storms disturb only the denser regions of air within seven miles of the earth's surface. The top limit of most storms is only about a half mile up in the air, and airplanes frequently clear them. As to width, however, a storm may spread over a thousand miles square of territory. The sprawling storms usually are not the dangerous ones.

FIX INHERITANCE TAX ON ESTATES

An inheritance tax of $497.13 has been assessed by the DeKalb circuit court against the estate of the late Kate A. Leighty of St. Joe.

The order shows the estate had a gross valuation of $44,795.38, of which $27,385.38 was personal property and $17,410 was real estate. Debts, claims and expenses amounted to $6,271.88, leaving a net value of $38,523.50. A son, John R. Leighty, receives $32,100 and a grandson, Carl C. Leighty, $6,080.

Other inheritance tax orders made by Judge Endicott so far during the April term includes an assessment of $109.84 against the estate of the late Ida J. Wert. The net value of the estate was $3,625.12, of which a niece, Cora Bair, receives $1,000 and pays $25 tax; the Ebenezer Orphan Home of the Evangelical association receives $1,312.77 and pays a tax of $84.89; and the husband, Peter Wert, receives $1,312.35 and pays no tax.

An assessment of $43.12 is made against the estate of the late John M. Wood. The net value was $4,157.10. A brother, Seth Wood, and a sister, Josephine Porter, each receives $1,385.70 and each pays a tax of $17.71. A nephew, Frank Wood, and a niece, Otha McKinley, each shares in the estate to the extent of $692.85 and each pays a tax of $3.85.

A Comforting Service

From the moment the first telephone call comes in, all the resources of this organization are called into play to assist the bereaved family. Our service goes beyond the common idea of the functions of a funeral director. It includes attending to many annoying details which are usually left to members of the family. It also extends to the giving of advice on the many perplexing problems which arise at such a time. The experience, sympathy and reliability of an organization like ours are always appreciated.

Wind is a Close Second to Fire

In destuction and damage to property, high winds are almost as culpable as fire. A wind need not be of tornado force to do serious damage; nor is wind damage a hazard peculiar to any section of the country. Exceedingly high and dangerous wind movements have occurred in almost every section of the country and history will undoubtedly repeat itself. Windstorm Insurance is very moderate in cost.

WE DON'T HAVE THOSE OLD 8 mile speed limits NOW

Many states prohibited driving in excess of 8 or 10 miles per hour in "built-up" communities. Twenty miles per hour was once considered highly dangerous. Improvements in the automobile and advances in traffic control have changed all that. ¶ Likewise the constant improvements wrought by Shell in motor lubrication have made higher speeds safe for the automobile engine. That's the important thing about Shell Motor Oil. It is always ahead of requirements . . . ready now for next year's car. ¶ Low-temperature refining preserves all of the rich lubricating elements of Nature's best-balanced crude. No emergency ever finds Shell Motor Oil lacking in protective qualities. No wonder so many motorists are turning to Shell.

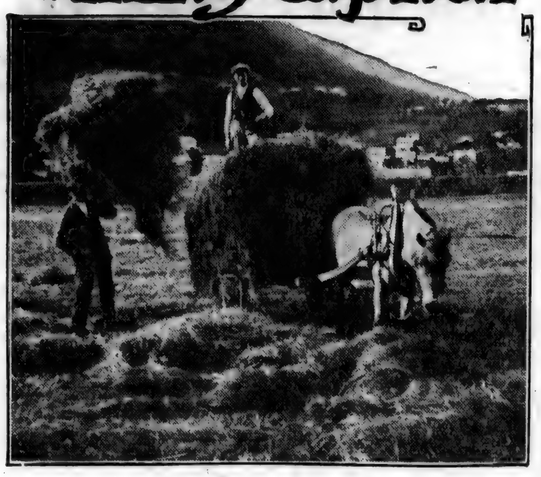
Trondhjem, Viking Capital



Haymaking in Norway.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

TRONDHJEM, old Viking capital, and the surrounding country of central Norway, recently celebrated the nine hundredth anniversary of the death of Norway's patron, Saint Olaf, the king who established Christianity in Europe's northwestern corner. The city's name was officially changed a few months ago to Nidaros, its ancient designation; but the inhabitants are not unanimously pleased with the change, and "Trondhjem" continues in partial use.

Modern Trondhjem is built on a peninsula formed by the River Nid and the Trondhjem fiord which indents Norway's west coast. Its houses are cheerful frame structures painted in white or light colors, with potted plants making colorful spots at their windows. The royal palace, a huge, white building, is one of the largest wooden buildings in the world.

The shops have many unusual wares for visitors. Furs are sold and there is a demand for blue and silver fox, polar bear and ermine. Elderdown quilts, bear skin rugs, embroideries, carved wood souvenirs, and silver carved in old Norse designs are popular with tourists. Many of the larger shops are on Olaf Tryggvesson street, which was named after the town's founder.

Although it lies in the same latitude as southern Iceland, Trondhjem has summers like those of England, and its winters are no more severe than those of Germany. The river and the fiord are seldom frozen. In summer numerous trees and shrubbery give the town a semitropical appearance which the visitor had not expected.

The long Arctic summer daylight has its effect on the farmlands surrounding Trondhjem. Often there are two crops a year of produce which yields but one crop in temperate climates.

Norse Coronation Place.

Trondhjem was the coronation place of ancient Norse kings; and the present king, Haakon VII, was crowned there in 1906 when the union of Sweden and Norway was dissolved. The city has a population of some 55,000. Much of its life centers about the water front. The ship building industry is brisk and there is a boat service between Trondhjem and Bergen and the North Cape. Numerous fishing boats come in with their cargoes of salted herring to be deposited in the tall, quaint gabled warehouses which line the quays.

The lofty Gothic spires of Trondhjem cathedral rise above the surrounding low buildings of purely Norse architecture in striking contrast to them. The cathedral looks like a transplanted English church in a Norse setting. Its Gothic style may be attributed to Norsemen, living in England when the Gothic architecture was attaining its vogue, who preferred it to the simpler Norse style and incorporated it into the cathedral. The structure was begun during the reign of Olaf the Quiet, between 1066 and 1093. It has been restored many times but each restorer has kept to the Gothic style and the present restoration has endeavored to follow the original building.

All the excitment which marks our most generally observed holiday, Christmas, attends the Day of St. John on June 24. While it bears a Christian name, the holiday and its customs go back to pagan origin. In effect the day still is a festival of the sun. Green birch trees adorn every house and children carry evergreen branches through the streets. The analogy to Christmas breaks down, however, when younger folk crowd into boats on the fiords or hike to the mountain woods which, at twilight, are flecked with bonfires. All night long these beacons burn, as ghostly figures of the merry makers dance and sing around them.

Life in Central Norway.

Yearly more visitors are strapping on their knapsacks for walking trips through the rugged countryside of central Norway, where every rock-hewn road seems to lead to a fiord, and where the native customs defy the inroads of such driblets of travel as now sift through.

The visitor goes to church, and the simple services seem stereotyped enough until a bit of statuary descends from the ceiling. The figure of an angel, supported by a rod, holds a bowl filled with water. The surprised visitor realizes this theatrical appurtenance is a baptismal font.

The simplicity and innocence of the country folk in the remote and isolated sections is betokened by their promiscuous bathing. And by "bathing" is meant just that; not the diversion of water splashing and sand sunning, but getting oneself clean. A log hut is the village bathhouse. A furnace of stones is heated and water poured over the red-hot surface.

Into this steam steps a family—men, women, children, visiting relatives and neighbors. The bathers switch each other with birch twigs to induce more perspiration and gleefully throw buckets of cold water over each other when the heat becomes too intense. All of this is nothing of an orgy—but as prosaic as our daily bath. The rural Norwegian would see nothing immoral nor funny in an American hotel which inadvertently advertised "1,000 rooms, and bath."

In a Vermont village each family once had its horse and buggy, a vehicle now supplanted by the automobile. In a Norway hamlet a boat is the principal family conveyance in summer. There fishing takes the place of farming and the houses are strung around a bend of a fiord instead of along a rambling main street.

Grazing herds of goats is the principal land industry of Norway's hilly north country and these flocks give rise to the picturesque goat-girl. The mountain pastures usually are far removed from the villages and each spring sees the young farm women driving their herds up the mountain paths to some lofty but sheltered valley among the glistening, snow-capped peaks. There they remain all summer long, camping in wooden huts, visited occasionally by their men folk to carry away the butter and cheese.

Goat's Cheese Is a Staple.

Goat's cheese, a delicatessen delicacy in the United States, is a principal article of Norwegian diet. It has the rich, brown color and something of the flavor of peanut butter. It is not eaten on crackers as a supplementary course but, sliced and laid on large cross sections of brown bread, is a staple of the meal.

Characteristic of inland Norway is Lillehammer which lies at the northern end of Mjosen lake, Norway's largest body of fresh water. The town is a gateway to the Gudbrandsdal. In this valley many ancient customs and costumes of the country are still in vogue. The town itself lies on the north and south rail route from Oslo to Trondhjem, and is visited annually by thousands of tourists.

This region differs markedly from the fiord country bordering the Atlantic coast and the "land of the midnight sun" which lies farther to the north. In spite of its high latitude Lillehammer enjoys a comparatively mild climate, resort hotels being open for visitors the year round.

Of supreme interest to both Norwegian and foreigner is an outdoor museum of ancient arts and crafts at the nearby village of Maihaugen. Fifty hand-built farmhouses, mills, workshops and barns were purchased, moved to one community, and enriched with collections of old Norwegian handwork. There are articles of wood, brass, leather and iron, together with examples of weaving and embroidery typical of the products of cottage handicrafts carried on by peasants of the neighborhood during long winter evenings. Here are also spinning wheels, looms and tools used before the introduction of factory goods. During tourist season provision is made to have artisans actually working at loom and forge so that memory of the country's historic peasant arts and crafts may not entirely fade from the earth.

Lillehammer, itself, while it is the metropolis of Gudbrandsdal valley, and claims more than 5,000 inhabitants, has had only a century of corporate existence.

The SANDMAN STORY

ABOUT SEA PINK FLOWERS

NOT far from the ocean was a meadow filled with bright pink flowers. The meadow was rather marshy and the salt water of the ocean had stayed to make a long visit with the land.

"We would lose our color," the flowers said, "if we weren't near the sea.

"It is the sea that makes our flower petal cheeks bright with color.

"If we lived further inland our cheeks would be pale. We sometimes become pale when we are older and a little tired.

"But here, with our feet in salt, marshy land, and our faces blown by the beautiful freshness of the sea winds, we have bright pink faces."

Mother Ocean Roared in Her Low Deep Fashion.

Not far away Mother Ocean roared in her low, deep fashion. She was teaching the Wave children their ocean lessons.

"Never mind how rough you are, my dears," she told them. "I like to have you stir things up a bit. I couldn't bear a family of children who were too quiet.

"There are some who might not want their children to make so much noise. They might say:

"'Won't you please hush! My poor head is tired.' But not Mother Ocean.

"When the Breaker Boys start playing and the Wave children have a high old time, does Mother Ocean tell them to hush, or that she has a headache?

"Oh, no! She tells them to go ahead and play—to play wildly, madly!

"She tells them to roar and shriek, to tumble and toss and twist and rock and roar.

"She tells them to call the Winds and race and play games and cut up pranks and scamper and do whatever they wish to do.

"She is a wild ocean mother, ah, yes, she is!"

So Mother Ocean was talking in her deep, low fashion.

The sea pink flowers heard her.

"That's good old Mother Ocean," they whispered to each other.

"She's a rough one at times," said the Breeze Brothers as they lazily blew this way and that with as little effort as possible.

"Oh, yes, she's a rough one at times," the pink flowers answered, "but she gives us so much strength."

The sea pink flowers were also called the marsh pink flowers. They were members of the Gentian family.

"We wouldn't like to be away from her," the flowers continued. "We feel that we wouldn't have any strength or energy where Mother Ocean never visited.

"We like to hear her talk. It makes us feel so full of life when we hear her great, splendid voice.

"Then she uses such a wonderful perfume—it's so briny and salty and fresh, and such a suitable perfume for an ocean to use."

"I've never heard any more praise for a neighbor than you're giving now," the Breeze Brothers said.

"Of course," they added after a moment, "we really shouldn't say that, for others are just as much devoted to those who are near them. The flowers of the meadows and of the valleys are just as fond of their neighborhoods.

"But you do seem particularly pleased."

"She gave us a pretty pink color," the flowers said. "And we're just vain enough to be fond of a bright color.

"Maybe that's not vanity, but at any rate it is taking an interest in our looks.

"We wouldn't take such an interest in our looks if we hadn't the sea air.

"It's Mother Ocean who gives us our zest for living and our healthy feelings, our brightness, and our color.

"We're very grateful to Mother Ocean. Without her, to us at least, life would be so dull, so—saltless!"

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

ST. SWITHIN'S DAY

EVERY year on the 15th of July millions of people in the English-speaking world watch the skies anxiously to see if it is likely to rain before night. And every year the newspapers state that the meteorological records do not bear out the old saying:

"St. Swithin's day if it do rain for forty days it will remain;
"St. Swithin's day if it be fair for forty days 'twill rain no mair."

But what is a meteorological record when confronted by a superstition? It is not necessary that a superstition should work every time. If it works now and then it is enough to render it "exempt from mutability and decay." And the St. Swithin superstition does work—occasionally.

Swithin was lord chancellor of England, a great lawyer and a great statesman. He superintended the education of King Alfred and installed into him those virtues and that learning which caused him to be afterwards known as Alfred the Great. It was through his statesmanship that the seven states of the Heptarchy were consolidated into the Kingdom of England. The chancellor died directing that his body be buried in the churchyard among the poor. One legend says he chose a spot where the rains might drip on his grave from the church eaves. On July 15, one hundred and nine years later, with great pomp the chancellor's remains were removed to a tomb within the church. A great storm came on and it rained for forty days. And there you have a full-born, robust superstition which grows young with the ages. It is said that Swithin was never regularly canonized but was called saint after his stormy protest at his translation.

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

WHY DO WE CALL IT A SPELLING "BEE"?

EVERYBODY knows what a spelling bee is. If we have not engaged in one we have undoubtedly seen them, read about them or heard about them. But why should we call it a spelling "bee" instead of the more correct and more descriptive spelling match or spelling contest or some such phrase?

The answer reveals the characteristic American inclination to indulge in homely metaphor whenever and wherever the occasion offers.

Early in our colonial days the word "bee" came to be used synonymously with "crowd" or "gathering" from the fact that bees always swarmed or crowded into and about their hive. So they coined the expression spelling bee to denote a great gathering or swarm of people at which everybody took a turn at spelling.

For Meditation

By LEONARD A. BARRETT

THE MYSTERY OF LIFE

LIFE is a mystery because it cannot be defined. Joseph Cook said: "It is the power which acts." The philosopher, Spencer, defined life as the eternal energy. Dr. G. Carl Huber, the noted anatomist at the University of Michigan, defined life as "The continuous adjustment of external and internal relations." These efforts to tell what life is are only descriptions, tell us how life functions. They are not definitions in the sense that they tell what life is. If any person can write a satisfactory definition of life he will render no small contribution to a very interesting subject.

L. A. Barrett.

Life is a mystery because it cannot be analyzed. We cannot put it into a crucible and pound out its secret. It is also impossible to place life in a test tube for the purpose of examination. The reason is that we cannot handle, taste or see life. It is impossible for us to recognize life by any of the five senses by which we recognize other things in this world. We are conscious of life only through its manifestations.

Life is also a mystery because we cannot destroy it. Pound the cake of yeast all you please you cannot destroy the power of fermentation. Death does not destroy life. It is only an incident in the development of life. Nature knows nothing about death. What is called death is only a transition into other forms of existence. The dying leaves of autumn make more beautiful the foliage of the spring.

Life courses through the realms of thought defying definition, analysis and destruction. We do not know what it is. The most serious question, however, is not, What is life? What are we going to do with it? is the more important issue. This is true especially when we remember that 90 per cent of the economic failures are due to moral defects.

The real quality of one's life is not necessarily measured by what one achieves. Not what we do but what we honestly tried to do is the ultimate test of the value of one's life. Not what we are but what we are striving to be are the records which tell the final story. It is the upward and outward purpose in life that gives character its strength, power and beauty.

Dear Editor:

ENTHUSIASM is a rare and beautiful thing, but at times I've found it expensive. I recall the time I was paid $3 for operating a stereopticon for a minister. So deeply did his talk and his pictures move me that I contributed $5 to the collection plate and had to borrow carfare to get home.

The first time I met a famous humorist I begged or borrowed all of his books and read them avidly. It nearly ruined a beautiful friendship. I found he repeated, and much of the spontaneity of his conversation was lost to me.

Spreading Demand for More Beautiful Roads

Strange things are happening to the Great American Road.

For several years the American Civic association has been giving prizes for the most attractive, the most neatly kept wayside refreshment stands, in an effort to improve the looks of the usual rickety food purveying shacks of the traveled highways.

In New Jersey they have passed a law putting billboards under state control, charging a tax on space used, and reserving the right to bar excessively unsightly structures.

And in New York Governor Roosevelt has asked for an appropriation to be used in setting out trees along highways in certain districts. He says:

"These plantings would be primarily to demonstrate that the highways could and should be made more sightly. An increasingly large body of public opinion recognizes the beauty of tree-lined highways, as well as their economic value."

What the present concern with roads really means is that America, after spending its entire career to date getting ahead in the world, is setting itself in order for more civilized living. —Philadelphia Ledger.

Worth-While Comment by Southern Newspaper

More and more public officials, civic organizations and citizens generally are paying more attention to trees and other natural assets that add to the beauty of urban centers. Certainly no community has finer trees than Mobile has, nor is there anything connected with the city's life that is more attractive to strangers who visit Mobile.

While it is proper to save these trees when they can be saved the people here also should pay more attention to planting trees. Some of the older trees are dying out. Young trees should be planted to take the place of these when they can no longer hold out against time and the elements.

Along many of the streets of Mobile, and in some of the park areas there are trees that will not last many more years. Young trees should be coming on to take the place of these old trees. It would not cost much and it certainly would be worth while.—Mobile Register.

More Action, Buddy

We talk too much and do too little. From the days when the expression, "There oughtta be a law," originated on the Texas frontier, we have had the notion that once we passed a law or even a resolution, our problem was solved ipso facto. Nowadays public officials attach the same weight to their own mere statements, and we the people too often accept their valuation. We might better use the words of the movie director to a posing youth: "A little more action, Buddy; a little more action." And we might apply the suggestion even to ourselves in our efforts to improve our towns, our societies, our churches, our schools, not to speak of our personalities.—Nelson Antrim Crawford in the Household Magazine.

Making House a Picture

Shade trees are valuable because they increase the worth of your property in a very few years, provide delightful shade in summer, and serve to break the cold winds of winter. Before planting your trees it is always wise to draw a rough plan and then work with it as a guide. Plan your planting so that, when your place is approached from the road, a pleasing picture will be seen. Plant large trees at either end of the house, but studiously avoid any plantings that will obstruct the view from the road. Let the passer-by see your home and then you can see him.

Improve Home Grounds

Home owners can help make their city a better place in which to live, by improving the home grounds.

We often see an elegant house that lacks the final touch to change it into a "home." Landscape planting is the frame of the picture; the artistic setting; that final touch that changes a house to a home.

As a background or a frame to the picture which is to be created, shrubs or trees are indispensable. The idea being to have the surroundings harmonize so that the impression will be comfortable and homelike.

Many-Colored Face Bricks

American face brick manufacturers have far outstripped the rest of the world in the wide range of color tones and textures presented to the home builder. Now the prospective home builder has offered for his consideration a whole sweep of colors, in smooth and rough textures, ranging from pure pearl grays or creams, through buff, golden and bronze tints to a descending scale of red, down to maroons, purples and even gun metal blacks.

Routing Highway Traffic

Some small towns have concluded that routing highway traffic through their main streets does not materially aid business, but only causes congestion, and the speed of the tourist cars adds to the danger of the streets.

Today's Styles to Remain for While

Skirt Length and Waistline Not to Be Changed by Paris Couturiers.

Paris couturiers, in the midseason openings recently closed, have chosen not to upset the sartorial world by another revolution but rather to develop the current styles to the highest point of wearability yet, says a fashion writer in the Kansas City Star. Their creative energy has been lavished upon new details, leaving the fundamentals of skirt lengths and waistlines as they were. Moderation was the one great lesson of the opening.

Grecian influence is repeatedly commented upon in describing accented silhouettes. Such details as softly bloused waistlines, peplums, girdles and pleated skirt treatments contribute this effect, which made a distinct impression upon American buyers.

Great emphasis devolves up the rich fabrics featured especially in evening costumes, with metals strongly accented in discussing both dresses and wraps. Printed metals receive approving mention; likewise solid monotone metal fabrics of very supple construction, described as youthful and well adapted to the soft draping of the Grecian figure lines.

Fur trimmings acquire great interest through descriptions of picturesque collars, lavish and flattering, appearing on both evening wraps and daytime coats of the elaborated order. Afternoon coats in monk brown smooth surfaced woolens elaborated with brown astrakhan or in the new greens trimmed with bronze caracul create approving comment.

One of the latest things in Paris fashions is the dark frock with the contrasting top. Every one is showing them. Practically all Worth's new dresses have yokes, pointed front and back, and short cap sleeves in a lighter color and material. Lenief's tweed dresses have square-cut yokes of white crepe de chine that divide the bodice horizontally in two. Lelong shows a few draped contrasting yokes, but usually places his color division lower and shows the whole blouse or simulated tunic in a light color, while skirt and coat are dark. Maggy Rouff attaches a dark skirt to a light princess tunic that stops just below the hip bones. Lucile Paray runs her light yoke into the dark skirt in a long point front and back. Martial et Armand shows light bib yokes, sometimes attached, sometimes detachable, as does Jeanne Lanvin.

The tendency toward elaboration and trimming is illustrated in the employment of velvet ribbon on the Lucile Paray tweed dresses, and in some of the button treatments adopted by Vionnet. Others show fringed fabric edges as sponsored by Renee, and the massed bands of embroidery resembling old-fashioned braids used by Louiseboulanger.

Summer Foundation Is a Worthwhile Addition

The average woman will frown when she thinks of a foundation garment for summer wear. The fact remains that some disciplinary measure is necessary to the well-dressed appearance, whatever the temperature.

Batiste this year in a fine durable quality makes practical and cool foundations. Lightweight satin is made to look dainty and summery with lace decorations. Lace over net, as also voile, is suggested to mold the slight figure.

Silk Reps for Evening Revived by Paris Maker

Corded silk reps of changeable colorings is a new old-fashion revived by a Paris dress house which has made ball gowns for three generations.

Ruby red and fuchsia purple are developed with matching jewelry and wraps for the modern grande toilette of reps.

The dresses are made with ground length skirts molded to the hips and then flared in wide unpressed pleats.

ON REARING CHILDREN from CRIB TO COLLEGE

Compiled by the Editors of THE PARENTS' MAGAZINE

As a substitute for specific knowledge, educators for a time depended on "formal discipline," the idea that Latin, mathematics and other difficult subjects can develop the mind. This was a happy solution for all questions as to electives and new courses, but unfortunately it has not functioned under modern conditions. The mind trained to juggle mathematical formula may be quite helpless when there is an immediate demand for a knowledge of the principles of advertising. Occupations are now so specialized that success depends as much upon having a background of information along one line, as it does on general mental ability. In 1910 the census listed 428 classes of occupations. The 1920 census listed 572, of which 537 were open to women. It is likely that many more will be listed in 1930.

Down to the present day, among Latin peoples it is commonly not until the age of twenty-five that a young man becomes free to marry without consent of parents, and to act independently, while his sister remains even more circumscribed. But the English common law, the fountain head of American jurisprudence, while accepting the Roman age for marriage, lowered the age of majority from twenty-five to twenty-one. In a few of the United States today, females, in certain cases, are deemed of age at eighteen; but for them, as well as their brothers, twenty-one is the prevailing rule.

It is easy to see the importance of checking the practice of thumbsucking as early as possible. Here, however, a word of warning is perhaps necessary, for in this case as in others in the rearing of children, oversolicitude may do as much harm as neglect—or more. It may be well to remind the mother that some children enjoy the parental attention they achieve through their thumbsucking habit and may continue it so that they will not be deprived of that attention. The mother should take care to choose a method of breaking the habit which will not be harmful from a psychological point of view.

If you are fortunate enough to live in the country or where you have a backyard with hose attachment, the children will especially love an outdoor shower bath in summer. One family arranges the garden hose so that it drops over the top of a step-ladder and makes a small niagara for neighborhood bathing parties.

The widespread interest in Colonial furniture which has developed during the past years, and the fact that early American maple reproductions (or furniture inspired by it) is used in thousands of homes today, makes the choice of furniture of this style for the young person's room, a logical one. It also affords an opportunity of vitally interesting the child in early America, and develops his appreciation of good things by teaching him to understand the historic interest of the furniture about him.

MUST DRIVE PSYCHOTECHNICAL MACHINE

A candidate for a motorist's license, intent upon driving the confusing new "psychotechnical machine," adopted by the police department at Vienna. He is shown at the miniature steering wheel which controls the pencil which he must direct through a map of congested traffic on streets, turning around on the cylinder by electricity—a task which demands complete attention and concentration.

BILL, THE BUS DRIVER SAYS

Killin' folks outright is bad enough, but even scarin' 'em to death don't win you no applause."

(By MARCUS A. DOW.)

Did you ever try to lead a spirited hound dawg on a leash, or did one of them ever lead you? You know the kind I mean, one of them yankin', strainin', tuggin', yelpin' hounds with forward march on the double quick as their main object in life.

I know a lot of bozos who make their automobiles act like one of those restless hounds strainin' on a leash while they're waitin' for the traffic light to change. They shoot forward like the leash had busted, and if they knock down a walker who ain't had time to reach the curb, it's all in the day's fun to them babies.

The red light was showin' on a crossin' in a little upstate burg and cross traffic was goin' by while the main stem drivers sat still. Among 'em was a drivin' fool at the wheel of a six-cylinder hound dawg. He had a sixth sense that could tell him just three seconds in advance of when the light would change. His engine let out a snort like the yelp of a hound, and at the first ray of green he jumped his bus almost off the pavement in his anxiety to be off in a hurry. As the iron hound jumped, the dust on the fender just brushed the skirts of a motherly lookin' old lady who had got two-thirds or better across the cross walk and scared the daylights out of her. She gave a little squeak, jumped, stumbled over the curb, hit her knee on a piece of wood with a sharp edge, cut a bad gash which resulted in a stiff knee for the rest of her life.

The ornery bozo what done that trick never looked back. What the h—l would he care? He'd say he didn't bump her and that would let him out. What a fine idea of fair play that is, I don't think!

That woman was crossin' accordin' to rules and regulations. She had a right to protection. And any guy that thinks a change to green gives him the right to turn his hound-dawg-on-four-wheels loose too quick and let it jump before a decent walker has a chance to reach the curb in safety is a low, mean, contemptible hawg. He ain't even a self-respectin' hound.

Safety Director Offers Some Worthy Suggestions

A code of practices affecting the car owner, designed to promote safety, was announced by H. O. Rounds, head of the safety and traffic division of the Detroit Automobile club. Mr. Rounds suggested that the motorists remember the following:

That if you give anyone a lift do not expect pay for it and don't be surprised if you lose your car or your valuables.

That whatever attracts, detracts, or allures, one should never lose control of his car.

That all roads are not smooth, but the same watchfulness is required on good roads as on bad ones.

That you will find people at cross purposes, but courteous treatment will decide the right of way.

That when you pause, do not block some one else. Give timely warning in anything you do that may affect others.

That proper care of your machine is necessary. Carelessness causes breakdowns.

That all-night driving is more difficult than driving in the light of day.

That sometimes more power is required, but also there are times when it is necessary to apply the brakes.

Simple Test for Leaks in Any Cooling System

Leaks in the cooling system are sometimes only apparent when the engine is operating, and the circulating water is hot. Such leaks are difficult to find and repair. The smallest leak, however, can be detected at once by applying air pressure to the cooling system. This may be done by using part of an old inner tube and a piece of cork. Use the cork to plug the overflow pipe and cut a circle of rubber from the inner tube with the valve at the center. Remove the filler cap and bind the section of the inner tube over the opening as shown. Pressure is then applied with a tire pump. Only a few strokes are required. Be very careful not to apply too much pressure to avoid damaging the radiator. The radiator of an automobile is not designed to withstand pressure. Too much may open up a seam or bulge out the side of the upper or lower water tanks.—Popular Science Monthly.

Dirty Automobile Cause of Owner's Depression

A clean car, at whatever cost, is worth the trouble, for it helps prolong its life and good appearance, and it has a stimulating and pleasant influence on its occupants, yet many motorists permit an accumulation of mud and grime to collect on their cars no matter how eager they might be to clean them. It should be remembered dirt hastens the aging of the car by deteriorating the finish, and a loss in pride of ownership, in prestige and self-esteem. A poor looking car seems to have a depressing effect on the owner.

AUTOMOBILE NOTES

Mud allowed to remain on the artillery wheel does more than mar appearance. It is also destructive of the paint.

• • •

The modern engine demands the highest type of plug performance and an intense spark is essential for its operating efficiency.

• • •

Brake squeaks in older cars may be due to the unevenness in the brake band. A thin piece of metal run around the drum will reveal such uneven spots.

• • •

Start your car in second gear if you want to, but remember that to do this strains the motor more than starting in first. And you can make quicker get-away in first speed, too.

• • •

A soft cloth, slightly moistened with kerosene, will remove dust from a lacquer finish if the latter is not too heavily incrusted. It is advised that the used should be careful not to get the cloth wet.

• • •

Coasting with the ignition turned off sends raw gasoline into the cylinders where it washes off the film of oil between the piston head and cylinder walls—and this means damage to the motor.

Gold Production Not Equal to the Demand

A gold shortage is threatening the world. The peak of gold production was reached in 1915, totalling $450,000,000. Since then it has gradually dropped until last year only $415,000,000 worth was produced. No important fresh discoveries have been made in recent years and old fields are gradually being worked out. There is plenty of gold in the world for all normal purposes but so much of it is hoarded away in the form of money in banks and as jewelry by wealthy families.

India has absorbed vast quantities of the world's gold, being hoarded by its petty princes and used for dowries, bridal gifts, etc. Twice the amount of gold is being used in jewelry today as compared with 20 years ago.—Capper's Weekly.

America's Gold Producer

Ontario can still boast America's richest gold producer in its rightly famous Hollinger mine inasmuch as that mine has yielded, up to the end of 1928, gold to the value of $145,000,000. The production of so much gold has entailed the mining and the milling of 17,000,000 tons of ore. The Hollinger's present subsurface workings, if placed end to end, would reach from New York to Albany and a little beyond, a distance of nearly 150 miles, and its underground railroad system has a length of more than 91 miles.

Tar Seekers Make Trouble

Motorcycle policemen patroled all streets near school buildings at Ventura, Calif., to halt vandalism of children bent on improving their teeth by chewing tar. Since the report that tar-chewing builds strong teeth was accepted by the children, repeated raids have been made on the city streets. Tar has been dug from the joints of the concrete thoroughfares and the city fathers declare roadbeds have been damaged by the resultant seepage of water through the cracks.

Another Einstein Theory

Prof. Einstein's theory of life, he expresses thus: "Never forget that the fruits of our work are not final in themselves. Production is meant to ennoble and make our lives easier, to give our lives a touch of beauty and refinement. Never shall we allow ourselves to be degraded into mere slaves of this thing we call production."—The American Magazine.

What is that Vitamin "C" ?

No one has ever been able to hold, stroke his feathers, scales or fur, trace his ancestry back to the dark ages or take his photograph, but like light, air, water and blood, we must have him.

(By Betty Barclay)

When baby's teeth get holes and breaks;
While dad's are filled with pains and aches;
It's just as plain as plain can be
They need a vitamin called "C."

Yet few know this. This study of foods is in its infancy. Those who understand dietetics thoroughly, form about as small a group as the Einstein theorists. Unfortunately we can carry this comparison further, for like those who think they understand the famous theorist, there are a few hundred thousand well-meaning men and women who think they understand foods—and those who thoughtlessly follow some of them are sure to get into trouble.

There may be someone who understands all there is to understand about foods. Oh yes! And by the same premise there may be someone who understands all about astronomy, electricity, radio and the Hereafter. They are like the famous giraffe—there may be such an animal "but there ain't."

However, we are learning gradually. The well-versed dietitian of today is as far ahead of the dietitian of fifty years ago as the electrical wizard of today is ahead of the early dabbler in things electrical.

Gone are the days when tomatoes were supposed to produce cancer, lettuce was fit for nothing but cattle, salads were effeminate and fruit cups were unknown. No matter how much more they may have to learn, dietitians already unanimously agree that fruits and vegetables of all kinds are filled with the things we need if we are to have perfect health, and that those who neglect them in their diet have a hard row to hoe.

The vitamins are comparatively recent discoveries. As a matter of fact, more and more of them are being discovered. So far, the famous trio, A, B, and C are the best known, and although no one attempts to place one upon exhibition, we know what they will do and what happens if our diet is deficient in any one of them.

Much research work has been done on vitamin C recently, which shows that this vitamin is of primary importance in the promoting of proper appetite, growth and good health, and that it is also an important factor in combating dental decay.

This vitamin is found in many foods. Oranges and lemons are filled with it. In fact, a prominent pathologist of Chicago recently recommended the juice of one-half lemon added to a half pint of orange juice, for children from six to ten years of age, and double this amount for older children and adults, for proper tooth structure and preventing dental troubles.

Of course you can secure your daily quota of this vitamin from any one of many other foods, or from a number of foods eaten during any one day.

Tomatoes contain this vitamin, but one would have to eat about twice as many tomatoes, by weight, in order to secure the vitamin C content of a pint of orange juice. Apples, peaches, bananas, strawberries, spinach cooked at home, commercially canned peas and string beans—all contain this desirable vitamin in certain quantity. Home-cooked cabbage contains it also, but according to Walter H. Eddy, Ph.D., Director of Good Housekeeping Bureau of Foods, Sanitation and Health, one needs 222 ounces of this home-cooked cabbage in order to secure the day's ration of this little vitamin. On the other hand, from the same authority comes the statement that a mere eleven ounces of raw cabbage will produce the same result—which is the best endorsement of cole slaw and raw salads containing grated cabbage that one could ask for.

It seems, however, that the morning orange juice habit is likely to take care of our vitamin C requirements. The vitamin C, secured from this, plus that gathered from other foods during the day, should suffice. Or, if we will but drink the amount advocated earlier in this article, we will be absolutely sure that we have taken care of our requirements. One thing about it— we can't get too much, unless we devour enormous quantities of food and get too much of everything at the same time.

Cultivate Vitamin C and the little chap will repay you a hundred fold. He is usually found where other vitamins, minerals and salts abound—and the foods that seem to be good for him will be found exceptionally good for you.

PRODUCING GOLDEN EGGS

(By Prof. H. D. Munroe)

The modern golden egg is produced by early hatched pullets and well cared for hen flocks. The early hatched pullet should be raised away from the hen flock to prevent disease. They should be separated from the cockerels as soon as the males can be picked out. The pullets will grow better and produce well if they are not crowded. Provide enough roosting space so that all the birds can roost at night without crowding.

Do no neglect the mash feeding during the summer months. The growing mash keeps them developing and makes it possible for them to lay when eggs are high. When the birds are on range it is advisable to feed both the grains and the mash in hoppers. The care of the growing pullet is not the same as that of the growing hen. With the pullet we want steady, uniform growth while with the hen flock we must force every possible egg from them before they go into the fall molt.

One serious mistake often made with the hen flock is that they are neglected when eggs are low priced in the spring. Laying mash should be kept before the hen flock at all times. Enough hopper space should be provided. Twelve running feet of feeding space is hardly enough for 100 hens. In addition to the dry mash, scratch grain should be given the birds once daily. During the spring months 12 pounds of grain a day per 100 hens is recommended. This amount should be reduced each month so that by September 100 hens are fed 6 pounds daily.

Red mites, or roost mites, probably cause more damage than any other one thing to both the growing pullets and the laying flock during the summer months. It is a shame that this is true because these pests are so easily controlled. Paint the roosts every two weeks with used crank case oil or some other oily material and there will be no trouble. Well cared for hens and pullets have taken the place of the goose that laid the golden egg.

Beggars Can Choose

By MARGARET WEYMOUTH JACKSON

Art is a jealous mistress. The difficulty with which Ernestine adjusts her own desires to the consuming flame of Will's genius is absorbing. Ambition culminates in drama, a great disgrace threatens, a sacrifice is made. The author frankly loves her characters and makes you share this genuine affection.

VOL. XLIV | ST. JOE, DeKALB COUNTY, INDIANA, THURSDAY, JULY 17, 1930 | NUMBER 29

WEEKLY EDITORS MEET AT PURDUE AUGUST 1-2

Lafayette, Ind., July 16.—Elaborate preparations are being made at Purdue University for the annual summer meeting and outing of the Indiana Weekly Press Association which will be held August 1 and 2. Headquarters for the visiting editors and their families will be maintained in the Memoral Union Building, where the opening luncheon will be held Friday noon, August 1.

The first afternoon will be devoted largely to a tour of the campus and adjoining farms. The editors and their wives will see a locomotive museum, which has the rarest collection of old locomotives in America; experimental engineering laboratories, shops where students get practical experience, physics research laboratories and other points of interest. Prof. W. A. Knapp is arranging a tour of the shops for the editors. Purdue livestock, including herds and flocks, which have an international reputation, will come under the watchful eyes of the editors when they visit the University Farm where Dean J. H. Skinner and associates will speak briefly. The editors' wives will get a glimpse of the school of Home Economics and the work that it offers and also the formal flower gardens.

President E. C. Elliott and George Ade, a Purdue Alumnus, and noted author and playwright, will be the speakers at the annual banquet to be held Friday evening. Saturday morning, while the husbands talk shop, the wives will be entertained with a special program by the school of Home Economics. Saturday noon, Aug. 2, all will join in a closing luncheon with Governor Harry G. Leslie as the speaker.

The last afternoon will be given over to another trip, including Fort Ouiatenon, the first settlement made in Indiana in 1719. The fort is being rebuilt and the first block house has been completed, so that the visiting editors will get a glimpse of a real pioneer post. The fort is five miles southwest of Lafayette along the Wabash River.

The Radio May Be Used as the Center of a Living Room Group.

Dear Beth:

What's this you say—a long, long wail a'troublin' you? I wouldn't be wailing about it, but be thanking my lucky stars I had a place to make interesting furniture groups. I'll make some suggestions which may be helpful to you, if they are not you know my feelings won't be hurt if I never see any evidence of them in your home.

Since you and Charlie both enjoy the radio so much, you will probably be getting a new and even more attractive cabinet when you go into your new home. It seems to me you might use that as a central piece for a group on the wall space you are almost in tears about. Above it you might hang a picture, one carefully chosen and worthy so prominent a place in the living room. Of course, there should be at least one chair, perhaps two—one of them a wing-back arm chair. If the radio cabinet seems small when placed against the wall, put on either side of it, small straight chairs. This will add interest to the group and give it good balance. Right now I can't think of any group of furniture which is not improved in looks and usefulness by the addition of a lamp. A lamp will help the radio group.

Two large arm chairs with a table between them, perhaps a table large enough to hold two lamps, would make another unit for this side of the room. You would want chairs which are decorative as well as comfortable, and of course they should be fairly large and important looking. The table might be placed against the wall and a pair of small lamps on it. This would provide lighting for both chairs and at the same time make a well-balanced group. A magazine rack beside one of the chairs would be very convenient. In place of the large table two small ones might be used, one of them with a book trough beneath.

An attractively proportioned gate-leg table, with one leaf down, could be made the center of a wall group. It could hold a lamp large enough to give light to two chairs. You might have the chairs rather light and delicate in design, leaving the table the most prominent piece in the group. Pictures on the wall would complete this group. One large picture might be used, or several small ones. You could use several hunting prints, or several landscapes, or whatever pleased you and fitted in with the rest of the room. Now, don't let me hear you complaining about too much space again,

With love, Fern Eture.

Hammer Mill Now in Operation

We have just completed the installation of our new Hammer Mill and are now in a position to give you grinding that the community around St. Joe has been waiting for.

It is equipped with a powerful Electric Magnetic Separator that all grain passes over before entering the mill and removes all bolts, nuts, nails, wire or metal of all kinds, which is a most important protection to your stock.

WE put this grinder in for YOU, now make use of it.

Give it a arial and you will come back for more grinding.

MEN LIKE SMALL COINS WOMEN DETEST THEM

Perhaps because his first acquaintance with cash came when he was a small boy with an occasional nickle or dime is why the average man of today prefers these pieces to any other kind of money. Watch any of the men here in St. Joe when they go to make a purchase of a cigar, pack of cigarettes, or any other commodity which costa less than a quarter. If he takes several pieces of money out of his pocket at the time to select the cash with which to pay for the article and he happens to have several nickles and dimes and a quarter or a half dollar in the lot, he will invariably use the largest piece of money in his hand.

It is very seldom that he will take up a dime and a nickle to pay for a fifteen cent purchase. Some how or other it seems that men prefer the smaller pieces to the larger, more bulky and heavier pieces of money in their pockets. As a matter of fact those who have made some inquiry along this line declare that the men like the smaller change because it is not so heavy in their pockets.

In some sections of the county the scarcity of one dollar pieces or "cart wheels" as they are often termed is so noticable that one often wonders if the United States mints are still turning out this paricular variety of coin. In other sections there seems to be a preference to these "cart wheels" to the one dollar paper money among some classes. However, in so far as the men are concerned the almost unanimous rule is that they will use a paper dollar every time in preference to the silver dollar and would rather have four quarters than two halves and so on.

There are several reasons perhaps which causes this to be true. Take for instance a telephone pay station; there is no slot in the pay box for a half dollar. The usual call runs about a nickle and sometimes a dime. If it does run more than a quarter the proper fee must be made up by dropping the necessary coins in the other slots. Car fares are usually a nickle and a man does not like to have to wait on change. Cigars are a nickle or a dime or fifteen cents and the smaller change comes in handy in making purchases of this kind. Stamp machines are made for the use of a nickle, as are many of the other classes of automatic vending machines, and the smaller coins are much handier than to have to get larger coins changed to make purchases thru these machines.

With women the money question is altogether different. A woman would ten to one rather have a half dollar in her pocketbook than two quarters, five dimes or ten nickles. Many of them when they start out on a shopping trip make it a point to rid their pocketbooks of all the silver coins possible and take only paper money with them. The larger the denominations the better they like it. As for pennies, a woman just despises them. She just will not tolerate a penny in her purse at all. They are entirely too bulky for her and take up too much room.

Then, too, the copper discolors the lining of the pocketbook, is apt to nick the silver on the back of her pocket mirror, get mixed up with the rouge, lip stick and a dozen or more other things which she finds is absolutely necessary to carry around with her, and space in the pocketbook is too valuable for that.

Some women dislike silver coins so much that after a day's shopping they will empty the pocketbook of all the coins and place them in a box until an opportunity presents itself to convert them into paper money or larger silver denominations.

Now, in so far as the editor is concerned there is not much choice when it comes to cash. There isn't going to be any row over the size and kind of money which falls into his possession so long as it is of the good old United States variety and can be spent. If it lives up to these simple requirements let her come and there will not be any fuss over it.

If you do not think these facts are true, do a litle observing on your own account here in Stt Joe and see if the facts set forth here are not true in the majority of cases.

DEFIANCE YOUTH DROWNS IN RIVER

Defiance was shocked Friday afternoon by the drowning of Cordray Harmon, age 8, while he and a dozen more of his little companions were wading and playing water ball. He had not been missed from the gang, but was discovered by G. W. Bradenberg, when wading out after a swim. The boy had been dead for some time and merely discovered by accident.

PERSONAL PARAGRAPHS

Ivan Chubb is now driving a new Plymouth 4, purchased thru the Hanna & Storer agency, a few days ago.

Cy Kline, who has been employed at the Hanna & Storer garage at mechanic, quit last Saturday to take care of his farm work and George Hartsough, of the experimental department of I. H. C., of Fort Wayne, has been secured as the mechanic.

Mr. and Mrs. Fred Reichelderfer and grandson, of Grand Rapids, Mich., came this week to attned the funeral of a nephew's wife, Mrs. Glenn Betz, which was held at Harlan Wednesday afternoon. They remained over night with Mr. and Mrs. John Betz.

The young people of DeKalb county are planning on an all day picnic in the Erick grove next Sunday, according to Miss Rose Smith of Corunna. Sunday School in the forenoon, basket dinner and afternoon program will take up the time for the day. All young people are asked to participate and adults are welcome.

Incendiarism is suspected in the fire which destroyed the Central League baseball park with loss estimated at from $20,000 to $30,000 at 1:30 o'clock Saturday morning. The dry wooden grandstands burned like tinder and firemen could do but little except keep the blaze confined to the park. Chester G. Schiefer, owner of the Ft. Wayne Central League team, estimated the loss at $25,000 to $30,000 of which about $13,000 was covered by insurance. That the fire was of incendiary origin was the opinion expressed by Mr. Schiefer.

MAIL, EXPRESS AND PASSENGER SERVICE KILLED

The action of the B. & O. in regards to the express, mail and passenger service at St. Joe, and other towns along their line east, is really a serious thing and it has an effect far more reaching than you would imagine, at first thought.

Saturday marked the discontinuance of the local train east, which carried the mail and express and its return in the afternoon.

As now is, there is only one passenger train billed to stop at St. Joe, and that is Number 8, due here at 9:48, P. M. east bound, and that is O. K., but when a company can cut off all means of service, then there is time for a general uprising of the natives. Some arrangements will need to be made for passengers, if nothing more than making the trains left to be scheduled as flag stops.

Tuesday marked the discontinuance of the express service, the agent, L. D. Young being checked out by the express auditor. At present no provisions have been made for the handling of this service and it is indeed a serious jolt, as the express is quite an item for the year, while right now this part of the receipts is no doubt depleted, the same as with all other industry and business firms.

Even the agent himself no doubt feels the need of the regular service, as all remittances and reports will have to be sent out by U. S. mail.

At this particular time about all we can say is that it is "one heck of a mess," but before long we feel that we will be given some solution out of the dilemma, and that as soon as we can lay the situation before the commission.

CHEESETOWN SCHOOL TO HAVE REUNION

The desire of a number of residents in the Cheesetown vicinity, will be gratified when the first reunion of the teachers and scholars of the once famous Cheesetown school, gather for the first time on Sunday, July 27.

The event will be an all day affair with pot luck dinner followed by a program.

No invitations have been sent out other than the date being broadcast by word of mouth by those who once attended this school and started on the road to "Larnen."

Will Hamilton will have charge of the program and C. A. Woodcox, the music.

MRS. HERMAN REASONER, ILL WITH CANCER, DIES

Mrs. Herman Reasoner, 42, residing between St. Joe and Newville east of the Widney orchards, died Saturday morning at 4:15 after an illness of five years from cancer.

The deceased was born in California, Michigan. She is survived by the husband and two sisters, Mrs. Mabel Brandon and Mrs. Charles Davis, of Auburn.

Short services were held from the late home Monday morning at 11 o'clock and the body was taken to California where services were held at 2 P. M. Burial was made in the cemetery at California.

CARD OF THANKS

I wish to thank the neighbors and friends for their kindness shown during the continued illness and in the death of my wife and for the assistance rendered from time to time.

PEDESTRIANS VIOLATE JAYWALKING EDICT

New York pedestrians violating the jaywalking edict of the police commissioner, by crossing Fifth avenue and Twenty-third street against traffic lights.

ROADS RENDERED PUNCTURE PROOF

Three Large Magnets Patrol Missouri Highways.

Missouri motorists are being saved about $500 a day in expense and grief from punctures.

That is the state highway department's estimate of the value of three 960-pound magnets attached to a two-ton truck which patrols gravel roads of the state.

Remove Cause of Puncture.

Potential causes of punctures thus are cleared off Missouri roads in wholesale amounts. Usually a day's run, with the truck covering about 56 miles of road surface, brings an average of 112 pounds of miscellaneous metal—nails, bolts, springs, staples, tin cans and scrap iron.

On the assumption that the magnets' work prevents 1,000 punctures a day, C. P. Owens, maintenance engineer of the highway department, says the outfit means a saving of at least $500 a day to motorists, figuring each puncture's cost at 50 cents.

With one manget hanging from the rear of the truck, and two others at the sides, the truck can clean a strip of road surface from seven to eight feet wide.

Operating Apparatus.

The operating apparatus consists of a 110-volt compound wound generator equipped with panel, voltmeter, ammeter, automatic discharge switch and powered by a five horse power gasoline engine, all mounted on the truck.

Experiments have shown the magnets operate efficiently when adjusted to a height of four inches above the road surface, with the truck moving at ten or twelve miles an hour.

It is necessary to "demagnetize" every four or five miles to clear off the magnets' collection.

Speed Motorways Vision of Traffic Authority

Prediction that within the next quarter century all major centers of population will be connected via high-speed motorways, such as is now proposed to be constructed between New York and New Haven, Conn., was made recently by W. L. Hinds, traffic authority.

"The rapid motorization of entire members of the American family, which is adding many thousands of new cars on our roads every month, is making such high-speed motorways not only necessary but imperative," Mr. Hinds states. "A street or highway, like a railroad trackage system, can only carry up to a certain maximum traffic charge, and when this is exceeded, congestion, delay and oftentimes injury result. Authorities estimate that even at the present time existing traffic congestion is costing this nation approximately $2,000,000 a year."

Pressure Reading Does Not Determine Quantity

It does not pay at any time to accept the pressure reading on the dash oil gauge as final on the amount of lubricant in the crankcase. This is particularly true in the summer.

The gauge is an efficient mechanism but it is not devised to record the amount of oil. To determine accurately, the gauge under the oil filter pipe should be read. This should not be construed as reflecting on the dash gauge. It is designed to record oil pressure not oil quantity. There is a great difference.

Reckless Driver Target of Laws in 12 States

Safety responsibility laws now in effect in 12 states are providing valuable experience in the nation's quest for the solution of the problem presented by the reckless and irresponsible driver. The law in whole or in part is now in effect in the following 12 states: New York, Rhode Island, Connecticut, California, Iowa, Maine, North Dakota, Wisconsin, Vermont, New Jersey, New Hampshire and Minnesota.

THE MOTOR QUIZ

How Many Can You Answer?

Q. What is considered the worst enemy of tires and what care should be exercised to protect them?

Ans. Hot weather and sunlight. Proper inflation will help greatly to preserve tires.

Q. What are said to be the staple colors used in the automobile field in order of their preference?

Ans. Blue, brown, gray, green and black.

Q. What are the four major causes for loss of power in an engine?

Ans. Loss of compression, improper valve timing, faulty ignition and improper carburetion.

Q. How many automobile grade crossing fatalities occurred in 1928?

Ans. According to Interstate Commerce commission figures, 2,165.

Curing Leaky Exhaust Valve Guides on Motor

The operation of a gasoline motor is not affected by leaky exhaust valve guides unless the wear is so bad that the valves do not properly seat, but leaky inlet guides cause irregular running at slow speeds and make it impossible to get the motor to idle smoothly. The illustration shows a way to eliminate this trouble. A light spring is fitted over the valve stem and a felt or leather washer is fitted on the stem with a hole that will just allow the valve stem to slide.

It is a good idea to place a thin metal washer between the spring and the felt, although this washer is not shown in the illustration. The light spring will keep the washer pressing against the top of the guide and prevent air leakage and the consequent spoiling of the mixture. This suggestion should prove useful on old cars where the expense of new valve guides is not justified.—Popular Science Monthly.

AUTOMOBILE HINTS

The object of cooling devices on brakes is to prevent "fading" after long steady use.

Jake Had an Alibi

By M. OWEN ATKINSON

(Copyright.)

WHEN they ran the sound rushes of Fleur La Barba, that once famous screen star's career was ended, Jake Rauch shook his head sadly. "Business is business," he said. "For ten years I pay her a salary like a president's. I guess she won't starve."

On the silent screen, La Barba had been charming. She invariably portrayed a beautiful and innocent young lady pursued by the villian. But when she opened her cupid's bow lips, out came a voice like the rasp of a file. You knew instantly that Miss La Barba was neither young nor innocent.

Jake Rauch was fat, bald, kindly, shrewd, and happened to be president of Superba Pictures Incorporated. He was noted for three things: He always changed the title of a picture before it was released. He had the happy faculty of being able to pick the unknown young ladies who became next year's stars. He was afraid of scandal.

Jake was a business man. He believed in making a profit—Superba Pictures Incorporated usually netted him ten or twelve millions a year. Miss La Barba was no longer of service to Superba studios. Out she would have to go. Business is business.

Miss La Barba arrived smelling of gardenias and looking like something on the cover of a magazine. Jake broke the news tactfully.

"You're fired!" he announced. "Your voice is terrible! Next week your contract runs out. I ain't goin' to sign it again."

Knowing Miss La Barba, Jake ducked and waited for the storm to break. It came with a crash. "What!" shrieked La Barba. "You're throwing me out? After all these years I worked for you, you turn me into the street without a nickel."

"Now listen," said Jake soothingly. "Two thousand a week I've been paying you. Ain't you got money in the bank?"

"Money in the bank? What do you think I've been living on? Do you know what a house in Beverley Hills costs? And my car, my horses!"

Jake shrugged eloquently. "Am I responsible if you live like a queen? I've got to think of my stockholders, ain't I?"

Miss La Barba became suddenly cold. "You'll pay for this," she cried, her voice more rasping than ever. "I'll ruin you! I'll make you the laughing stock of Hollywood."

Miss La Barba began to scream. "Help! Help!" she shrieked. "Police! Murder! Help! Mr. Rauch is trying to murder me."

Jake's eyes bulged. He sat frozen in his chair. He knew now. Scandal. Presently the office force would rush in and find the hysterical La Barba shrieking that Jake had tried to throw her out of his office. After that would come screaming headlines in the newspapers.

Miss Williams, Jake's secretary, was the first to arrive. Her cool impersonal glance took in the situation. She liked old Jake, liked working for him. Swiftly, deftly she tried to sooth the screaming actress.

The door burst open. In rushed Danny Shea, the publicity man. His newspaper trained eye gathered in the details with flashlight precision. "My G—d!" he cried. "What a story!"

The next to arrive was Maurice Lavine, vice president of Superba Pictures, smooth, oily, sleek—and envious of Jake Rauch's reputation and job.

"Jake!" he cried with pretended horror. "Shame on you!" He crossed to La Barba and patted her tenderly on the shoulder. "What is it, little girl?" he asked sympathetically. "What has he been doing?"

"The beast!" sobbed Miss La Barba. "He tried to throw me out." For the first time in her life she was really acting. "I came to see him about my contract. He—Oh, it's too terrible. I don't want to talk about it."

"Hey, wait," called Jake. "Don't I get a chance to say anything?"

"Such a shame!" said Lavine.

Miss La Barba's eyes gleamed triumphantly behind the tears. Already she could see her picture on the front page of all the papers. She would use that pose with her legs crossed.

"Wait a minute," Jake hadn't moved from his chair behind the broad-topped desk. "Everybody talks so I can't get in a word. Don't anyone want to listen to my alibi?"

"Alibi?" Lavine jeered. "How could you have an alibi when you are both in the room together? No, no, Jake, my friend, you aren't going to get out of this so easy."

"I didn't touch her!" Jake insisted. "I haven't moved out of this chair. I was sitting here quietly all the time she was here in the room. I got an alibi to prove it."

Jake lifted his right hand.

It held a fat black cigar. The cigar had over an inch of fluffy white ash.

For Meditation

By LEONARD A. BARRETT

THE PROBLEM OF FATIGUE

ONE of the important problems in the field of engineering is to compute the amount of strain which can be borne by a girder used to support the roadway of a bridge. Error in making the computation or failure to reinforce when the strain becomes evident, will in all probability result in the downfall of a structure. This element of strain is one against which not only the natural laws but also moral law cries, "Just so far and no further."

L. A. Barrett.

In the field of industry, laborers working eight hours a day are able to turn out a product larger in quantity and of better quality than when working ten hours a day. Experiments in the field of industry have established the fact that no man can do his best work when fatigued. This fact has become a vital problem in the field of industrial efficiency. Some manufacturers are endeavoring to solve the problem by introducing the five-day week. The results of this effort are still uncertain, as the five-day-week idea is still in the experimental stage.

In the world of moral values it also is an established fact that no fatigued man can be at his best. In the building of character there is a moral overstrain against which the higher nature cries, "Go not beyond this mark." We are gradually coming to appreciate the close affinity between morality and the psychic centers. Very clear demonstrations have been made of the serious results of nervous overstrain in which the "brain, spinal chord and the entire nervous system became involved." Fatigue can play havoc with the psychic centers. "A tired person is literally a poisoned person—poison due to the unexpelled toxins of fatigue."

Much of the crime today may be traced to fatigue. When fatigued, people will do and say things which at a later period they would give anything to be able to recall. When circumstances lead one to face a crisis in an hour when resistance is at its lowest level, a crime is committed.

The remedy may be found in seeking opportunities for proper rest of body, mind and soul. Thus shall there be stored up sufficient energy for better service. The possession of self-control secured through proper rest, will command all the forces of our nature, which is the secret of efficiency.

Wilson Merely Amused by "Cheeky" Youngster

President Hoover is said to be fully as reserved as the man he succeeded. Although people in private conversation often referred to Mr. Coolidge as "Cal," no one ever personally addressed him that way and it is said that none of Mr. Hoover's closest friends call him "Bert" or "Herb."

This was much the case with the late President Wilson, but in his case, a few old friends continued, in correspondence, to address him as "Tommy" long after he had dropped his baptismal name of Thomas.

Once, while Wilson was making a western tour, a little chap yelled "Hello, Woody."

Young America's effrontery amused Mr. Wilson. In his speech that evening he referred to it and remarked that he had no objection to being thus addressed provided it was not meant to be descriptive.

Tropical Fish's Great Resemblance to Bird

Of all the great game fishes in the ocean near Florida, the splended sailfish is first in interest. Although this lithe acrobat of the Gulf stream is needlessly slaughtered by thousands each year, says Nature Magazine, it still remains one of the least known of the popular tropical fishes. No one really knows where this quaint wanderer of the deep breeds, whither he goes or whence he comes. But he cruises along the Gulf stream, alone, in couples or in small schools, sometimes quite small, though well past the baby stage, one of the quaintest fish in all the world.

His querulous, down-turned mouth and large bright eyes set near its base; his long beak and high, flaunting, purple-splotched dorsal fin, which suggests the frill of some long vanished saurian, give him a strange bird-like appearance.

Not a Miracle

While drawing a bucket of water from a well on his property at Greenwich, Conn., Joseph Krom lighted a cigarette and tossed the match in the bucket. The explosion which followed consumed the contents of the bucket. He drew another bucketful and threw it on the ground and set a match to it. Again there was a brisk blaze. He summoned the fire company and an investigation disclosed that a leaking gasoline tank in a nearby factory was causing the seeming miracle.

Horseshoes Made Trouble

A curious incident happened in a sawmill at South Paris, Maine, when the saw hit something hard and spoiled all the teeth. A pair of horseshoes was found in the heart of a big pine which was 18 inches in diameter. The tree was cut near a schoolhouse and it is figured that a generation or so ago some one slid these horseshoes around the small pine, and the tree grew over and around them.

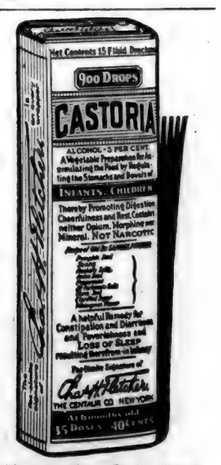
When Babies CRY



Babies will cry, often for no apparent reason. You may not know what's wrong, but you can always give Castoria. This soon has your little one comforted; if not, you should call a doctor. Don't experiment with medicines intended for the stronger systems of adults! Most of those little upsets are soon soothed away by a little of this pleasant-tasting, gentle-acting children's remedy that children like.

It may be the stomach, or may be the little bowels. Or in the case of older children, a sluggish, constipated condition. Castoria is still the thing to give. It is almost certain to clear up any minor ailment, and could by no possibility do the youngest child the slightest harm. So it's the first thing to think of when a child has a coated tongue; won't play, can't sleep, is fretful or out of sorts. Get the genuine; it always has Chas. H. Bruges, Still Medieval uges, Across a Canal.

...eaves, hung in a high bell tower. Day in and day out the music is produced by clock-work ringers; but in Bruges during the summer carillon season, world famous carillonneurs play by hand and foot, as does a great organist.

Bruges, like many unfamiliar foreign place names, may have an exotic sound to the American ear. But it has about as common an origin and is about as logically descriptive as "Three Rivers" or "Smith's Crossroads." Because the town from the beginning had numerous canals and structures carrying streets across them it was named (in Flemish) "Bridges." It is a sort of reversed Venice. Whereas the latter is an area of sea with islands scattered in it, Bruges is a land area cut into islands by numerous canals. In both cities many houses rise sheer from the water and boats are used for traffic.

Like Venice again, Bruges was once the commercial and banking center of the world. This was in the Fourteenth century. The center of commercial activity had moved from Italy to Flanders, and Bruges was then Flanders' greatest market. World trade came up the River Zwyn which then gave it a harbor; merchants from the four quarters of the world maintained headquarters in the city; and its bourse regulated the exchange rate for all Europe. Ghent was a strong rival, but until the Zwyn finally silted up in 1490 Bruges held its own. At the height of its power Bruges had a population of 200,000, and was one of the wealthiest and busiest cities in Europe. Now the inhabitants number about 5,000.

Trade Ruined by Silt.

During its busiest era, Bruges boasted headquarters of merchants from seventeen countries. Fabrics were shipped from Italy and the East, furs from Russia and Bulgaria, metals from Poland and Hungary. Wool, cheese and coal from the British Isles, fruits from Granada and Egypt, and Arabian spices and Rhenish wine were marketed there.

By the end of the fifteenth century the rivers and canals silted up, trade routes changed, and the merchants forsook Bruges for Antwerp, leaving a city of Old World charm for travelers to enjoy.

Canals which were once crowded with shipping now are clogged with silt, moss and lily pads, and in some parts white swans fearlessly swim about. Bordering quays are bare and silent. Many of the gabled dwellings and warehouses facing the quays, long the meeting places of boisterous sea rovers, are unoccupied.

In the doorways of medieval houses old women sit for hours in their picturesque costumes, making lace. They look as though they had stepped out of a canvas of Jan Van Eyck or Hans Memlic, famous Bruges artists. Some of the brick facades of the medieval homes are hung with large iron rings, which, in the days when Bruges was famed for its fetes, were used to hang ropes of flowers from wall to wall.

In the streets, huge thick-legged Flemish draft horses draw to market clumsy two-wheeled carts filled with green vegetables from nearby farms. And now and then one sees a dog-drawn milk cart, painted green, rumbling over the clean cobbles.

Grand Place, the city square, is the busiest place in Bruges on Saturdays when the market is ready for business shortly after dawn. City and rural costumes run the gamut of color and style, with broad flowing skirts and small lace caps dominating. Although vegetables abound on the well ordered stands, there are also copper and brass vessels, old clothes, used furniture and soiled books.

Belfry Tower Is Notable.

The Belfry Tower, one of Bruges' famous landmarks, rises 375 feet over the square. During the hectic struggles of the Flemish people with the Spaniards, the French, and neighboring towns, the bells in the Belfry Tower called the burghers to arms. In a room near the top there are numerous rods, pulleys and ropes which are connected with one of the finest carillons in Europe. It has 47 bells.

Viewed through a small window in the shaft, Bruges resembles a veritable checkerboard of red gables, pierced here and there by spires, towers and pinnacles. The narrow streets and canals wind in every direction and from this lofty perch the traveler sees Bruges as an inland island, for it is completely surrounded by natural streams and man-made canals.

Not to be cheated of a port by Nature's destructive forces, the people of modern Bruges have built several canals to the North Sea. The largest and most direct leads eight miles to Zeebrugge (meaning "the seaport of Bruges"). This port and its canal and the basin at Bruges figured prominently in the World war. The Germans developed a strong U-boat nest at Bruges from which their underwater commerce destroyers went out to sink many an allied ship and to which they returned for repairs and outfitting. When the war was over a tremendously strong shelter with a concrete roof six feet thick, built over the water, was left standing near the Bruges end of the sea canal, a monument to German U-boat activities.

The British, however, successfully hindered the U-boat activities from the Bruges nest by their famous sortie against the Zeebrugge mole when an old ship filled with concrete was sunk across the entrance to the canal.

Medieval Architecture.

Altogether, Bruges is one of the quaintest of the old Flemish cities and is said to preserve in its architecture a more medieval aspect than any of its sister municipalities. Prominent architectural features are the church of Notre Dame and the Cathedral of St. Sauveur, both excellent examples of early pointed Gothic, and the Market Hall with its dominant belfry.

In St. Basile's chapel is kept the Sacred Vial, brought by crusading knights from Jerusalem, reputed to have been the vessel holding the water with which Joseph of Arimathea bathed the bloodstained body of Christ. This reliquary is carried once each year in the procession of the Most Precious Blood.

The tapestry manufacturers of Bruges were world famous, and this city has long been noted for its woolen cloths.

The bells of Bruges that are ringing out the summer concerts are typical of those of the other carillons of Belgium and Holland. To attain the range of four octaves, the bell producing the lowest note must weigh several tons, while the smallest weighs scarcely 20 pounds. The bells are connected to a keyboard or to a clockwork mechanism, which causes their clappers to strike. Producing music from the bells requires great skill and dexterity on the part of the bellmaster, for he must use his feet for the larger bells, and the muscles of both his wrist and elbow are brought into play in producing the tremolando effect usually given. A fine carillon is not the result of a chance moulding of metal, but its making is as much an achievement wrought by a wise combination of excellent material and deep thought as a Stradivarius. Lovers of carillon music compare the tones to those of a pinaforte in delicacy and to an organ in majesty.

So closely has the love of bell music grown into the national life of the people of the low countries of Europe that it has lured to their shores poets and writers from other lands. Longfellow and Robert Louis Stevenson paid tributes to their silvery tones, and to Victor Hugo's imaginative mind, the spirit of the Carillon of Cechlin became personified as a dancer scattering magic notes on a sleeping world as she tripped from the heavens down a crystal staircase. To people who live within the shadows of these towers, the bells possess a personal as well as an historic significance.

The SANDMAN STORY

TOMMY'S ADVENTURE

TOMMY was a little boy who longed to adventure. He had heard his grandfather talk of a wonderful adventure to be had at the top of a mountain where lived a strange old man.

They had never gone all the way to see the old man, for there had been a lovely half-way place where they had always stopped and had a picnic, and then decided to put off the long climb until another time.

Tommy knew, for he had thought it all out, that he would only be able to get just so far at a time. In fact, they had told him so. They had told him that was the reason they had not gone farther.

So he decided he would not expect a great deal to happen at once, nor to accomplish a lot in a short climb.

He Raised His Stick—and Kept It Raised.

He was willing that the progress should be slow. He knew all along the way he would enjoy himself.

It was holiday time and Tommy made up his mind that he would find the pond and the cave, and he hoped he would see the old man.

Tommy's grandfather was delightedly excited over the idea. "I'll lend you the stick I used to take with me when I started on that trip—only I hope you will go all the way. Then, when you come back you can tell me about it." His grandfather's eyes shone at the very thought.

So bright and early one morning Tommy started off. No one went with him, for the few boys of his own age didn't like the idea of such a long, long tramp just for a sight of the pretty pond and a possible old man and a possible treasure.

"There's enough to do down by the river here not to go all that way to look for anything," they told him. "Besides, that story of the treasure sounds foolish. There aren't any treasures any more."

But it all sounded so thrilling to Tommy. It was like living years and years ago, somehow, and looking for things that were beautiful, and becoming friends with strange, strange, creatures, and finding a treasured reward at the end. Oh, what would it matter if it was a great effort! What an adventure!

He had a blanket and a knapsack of food and his grandfather's stick. "Don't be gone too long," his grandfather had said, for his grandfather would miss him as would the other members of the family. But they all envied Tommy his great adventure. They had all dreamed of adventures themselves.

Up and down the hills he climbed through woods and woods. After a long time when he was feeling quite weary he came to a small lake. He thought it was a very pretty lake, and he wondered if it would not be fun to stop here and explore. Probably this would do as well as the other. It was a long climb here, and he was quite, quite, tired. But then he remembered that this was where the others had stopped.

There was a higher hill beyond this, then some woods, and then up to the tip top it was called. That was where the beautiful pond was to be found, so they said. But now that he was feeling so tired he wondered if the pond really was there. No one had seen it. No one was really sure. Maybe the old man wasn't quite right in his mind. Maybe there wasn't anything there at all—no adventures to be had, no cave, no treasure, no wonderful, wonderful, beauty.

He sat and thought about it, but then decided he would go and see, though he was just a little discouraged when no one was really sure.

He had just begun to climb the next hill when he heard a hissing and a swishing in the glass.

Well, he was glad he had his stick with him. There must be no delay. Without a doubt this sound meant a snake.

And no sooner had he thought this than the snake was wriggling along ahead of him. He raised his stick—and kept it raised. Certainly the snake was showing no sign of hurting him. In fact, he was timidly hurrying away. After all, he was rather a pretty snake and he had almost a helpless look. How dreadful, Tommy thought to himself, not to have legs and have to move this way. He put down his stick and the snake looked around.

"Dear me, but that's a relief," the snake said in his funny, hissing voice. Yet Tommy could understand him perfectly.

"What's a relief?" Tommy asked.

"To think that you're a friend," the snake replied.

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

"RIGHT OFF THE BAT"

"HE DID it right off the bat," we frequently hear or say about some one, the idea being that whatever it was that was done, was accomplished without any preparation or equivocation but instantly.

Like so many other expressions, "right off the bat" comes to us from the world of sport. It was originally connected with the game of cricket, played in England and subsequently was transplanted to our own game baseball.

To do anything right off the bat is to do it as instantaneously as a man strikes the ball when it is thrown by the pitcher.

With the tremendous popularity of baseball, the metaphor struck just the needed note and quickly became a common phrase.

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

FELLING TIMBER BY MOON'S PHASES

FEW superstitions are more universal than the one which considers the phase of the moon when felling timber. It is a companion superstition to that one which regulates agriculture by the moon's phases and, like that superstition, has an almost incredible hold upon the popular mind. Like "planting by the moon," the idea that timber should be felled by the moon is accepted by people of intelligence and education without a thought that it is merely an ancient survival—a superstition reaching down from the days of moon worship—a part of the doctrine of Lunar Sympathy so dear to the ancients.

This superstition has existed in Germany since the days of Tacitus who mentions it as prevailing among the Teutonic peoples. In France, before the Revolution, the forestry law enjoined that all timber be cut in the wane of the moon and one may still see in French papers, according to Frazer, advertisements of wood for sale "cut in the moon's wane." In this country and Canada the superstition is widespread. Pliny, Cato the Censor and Macrobius, writing early in the Christian era, speak of the connection between the moon's wane and the felling of timber as of a fact no one doubted. This was in accordance with the theory of the ancients that the moon was the source of all moisture and that terrestrial matters waxed and waned in sympathy with the waxing and waning of the satellite. It therefore followed that the moisture in trees increased as the moon increased and timber cut at that period would not dry properly; while wood cut when the moisture was decreasing in all things in sympathy with the decrease of the moon, would soon be in a proper state for use.

Happy Woman Tells How She Lost 19 Pounds of Fat in 27 Days

During October a woman in Montana wrote—"My first bottle of Kruschen Salts lasted almost 4 weeks and during that time I lost 19 pounds of fat—Kruschen is all you claim for it—I feel better than I have for years."

Here's the recipe that banishes fat and brings into blossom all the natural attractiveness that every woman possesses.

Every morning take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen Salts in a glass of hot water before breakfast.

Be sure and do this every morning for "It's the little daily dose that takes off the fat."—Don't miss a morning. The Kruschen habit means that every particle of poisonous waste matter and harmful acids and gases are expelled from the system.

At the same time the stomach, liver kidneys and bowels are toned up and the pure, fresh blood containing Nature's six life-giving salts are carried to every organ, gland, nerve and fibre of the body and this is followed by "that Kruschen feeling" of energetic health and activity that is reflected in bright eyes, clear skin, cheerful vivacity and charming figure.

If you want to lose fat with speed get an 85c bottle of Kruschen Salts from any live druggist anywhere in America with the distinct understanding that you must be satisfied with results or money back.

Keaton states that a few years prior to this time Flint, the banker, beat him out of $4,000 worth of shares of First National Bank stock. He became enraged when he saw Flint leave the witness stand and shot him three times exclaiming, "This fellow ruined me." He then threw down the pistol and surrendered.

The spirit of the times demands swell homes, automobiles, and all the luxuries of life and it takes money to provide this display of luxury. In order to get their money—it has to come from some where and that some where is usually off of a guy that has earned all he has by hard work. Ruining people to make others rich and exceedingly prosperous are among the reasons why many prominent people are bumped off for their crookedness. While this case of murder must go in for condemnation instead of being justified in any sense whatever, it remains to be seen that if fair dealing had been at the bottom of these two mens affairs there would have been one more man living today and possibly two or three hundred more happier people in this world.

Mrs. McCormick fights back at Gerald P. Nye conducting the senatorial quiz, investigating her expenditures in the Illinois primary campaign in which she won. She wins the court's approval to question her accusers. It seems that her candidacy would never have been questioned by any senatorial committee had she been defeated and the senatorial committee is in no hurry to conduct a quiz into the expenditures of her opponents. It is remembered that Bishop Cannon was quized by a religious and a partisan element to intimidate him and wreck his influence for good in the country. In this case of Mrs. McCormick, the whole country knows, that this woman has done nothing unmeritorious in her life to give any authority or element in that state any reason for making it hard for her to be elected in the fall. It is evident that the people of all states are growing tired of being shoved around by dirty political control and graft. Mrs. McCormick has shown that she has conducted a clean campaign which will no doubt be another signal for a similar land slide to place her in office provided she can come through another senatorial quiz.

From Steubenville, Ohio comes the report that the enforcement of the Blue Laws in Jefferson county are being observed with success. We all remember when the thirteen original states, and with other states which followed later wrote their constitution's stringent laws guarding the religious and moral conditions of life. Of late years, because of the growing commercial interests of the country, and the fear of offending the almighty dollar, these were not enforced. Freedom of selling, and manufacturing on as during the week, until the American Sunday became a wide open holiday. And the wide open Sunday was excused, permitted and allowed because of the modern interpretation of Christ's words, "Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath."

But conditions became odious in many places, churches were forgotten, and the religious leaders feeling the effects of the lack of spirituality began a crusade to restore the hallowed condition of old time Sunday observance. They demanded of their officials that the law be enforced on theatre houses, which in retaliation demanded a complete observance hoping to de-popularize the law by making it impractical and burdensome to the people. Sheriff Griffin closed all but drugs and reported all quiet and law abiding. It only depends. If the people who run businesses on Sunday find that the Sunday is worth more to them as a religious Sunday they might put up a fight to keep things closed up. A day off from business is what every sensable business man ought to relish and actually demand, especially when it means the obeying of the ten commandments. Six days is enough to wallow around in overalls and he knows it. But the demand of the gadding public with its St. Vitas dance disposition demands that the world does the Charleston seven days a week for exactly the same dollar. The public will watch with intereest the final out come of the Blue Law rejuvination.

Ye Ed Draws the Line There

In the news one day last week a little story was printed about men models appearing in the streets of Chicago showing off little panties for men. Shorts they call them, and they come in all kinds of colors, ending just above the prettty knees of their male wearers. Rolled sox complete the ensemble. Sometimes I fear that men will become as senseless as women about clothes. A few years ago we departed from the old regulation pants to trousers big enough around the leg to make an old-fashioned pair of pants. Now they are trying to put these cute little panties on us. I may have to wear a pair of the sweet little things but I'll be darned if they'll ever get a brassiere on me.

Sir Conon Reports

Arthur Conon Doyle, who recently died at his home in London, is reported to have lived up to his promise to send a communication from the land of departed spirits. In a recent meeting before 10,000 people who had gathered to hear the message, a Mrs. Estelle Roberts attempted to make a delivery of the message. Because of some delay on the part of the clairvoyant to make an immediate presentation of the message about 50 persons in different parts of the audience began starting for the doors, being displeased. Mrs. Roberts being bothered by the tumult said, "I can't go on with all these people walking out." A tumult of conversation then arose and the meeting came to an end.

During the meeting Mrs. Roberts informed the widowed Lady Doyle that she had a message for her from her husband. Mrs. Doyle rose to her feet expectantly and the clairvoyant proceeded to read: "Tell Mary—" and then the message was intersepted by the peal of the pipe organ which prevented the further reading of the message.

It would seem to the intelligent minds of the world that the curtain saves the day for many shows. There is always a means of escape to those who practice deception. The organ was used to spill the beans in order to get another full house and get receipts when another attempt will no doubt be made to finish the message. The crowds that gather for manifestations of this kind only prove that Barnum was right. Why do men want to hear from the next world? Most of us know where we are going right now. Why all the inquiry?

ISSUES WARNING AND APPEAL TO PEOPLE

Indianapolis, Ind., July 16, 1930. —In the same breath a warning and an appeal to each motorist in the State was issued by the Board of Directors of the Hoosier State Automobile Association in their Annual Meeting at Indianapolis yesterday. The warning was against the indifference and callousness as shown by the growing tendency to accept personal injury, deaths and many millions of automobile property damage as a necessary and unpreventable part of our daily life. The appeal was to the point that the majority of these accidents are preventable and can be prevented readily by each individual helping to the extent of exerting his conversation and moral force in favor of obedience of motor vehicle laws, and in favor of enforcement instead of permitted evasion on the part of enforcement officials and Courts, and further that every motorist owes it to himself and others to report acts of careless driving as a means of eliminating the causes of accidents.

At the meeting all officers were re-elected for the ensuing year including J. Cooper Props, President, Muncie; vice president, R. W. Chambers of Evansville, C. W. Lanz of Bedford and C. B. Kern of LaFayette; W. L. Hubbard, treasurer, of Scottsburg and M. E. Noblet of Indianapolis, secretary-manager.

It was pointed out by the Motor Club officials that the drivers license law has taken more than 1000 dangerous drivers from the Highways of Indiana during the past year, and because of this it is steadily grawing in popular favor. "At the last session of the Legislature we sponsored a bill which provided that where a motorist caused an accident and judgment is rendered by the Court against him, that such person shall either pay the judgment at once, or provide acceptable guarantee of payment or else forfeit the privilege of driving a car until the judgment has been satisfied. This subject is a difficult one to handle and while it was passed by both Houses it failed to become a law. We are in hopes the next Legislature will enact a suitable measure on this subject which can become a law as it must be obvious to every one who drives an ouse to every one who drives an automobile that something must be done to place responsibility on those who deliberately cause accidents and are allowed to go 'scot free' and do the same thing over again. This measure has been sponsored by the American Automobile Association as well and already is on the law books covering a third of the entire motoring public in the United States.

"In the early days the problem was to secure good roads and streets in order to get out of the mud, and dust, but in securing these improvements the motorist has become confronted with the personal safety problem which is of far more serious and extensive importance.

"During the past year we have worked constantly to bring about the adoption of uniform traffic regulations in Indiana. The Indiana Municipal League and the Indiana Association of Police Chiefs have co-operated most heartily with the result that in the State-wide meeting a proposed traffic ordinance has been agreed upon and already has been adopted by some of our Indiana cities, including Evansville, Marion and Rushville. At this State-wide Meeting a resolution was adopted favoring the use of 'Stop' and 'Go' signs of the character that are installed on the corners of intersections, believing this type of sign obviously is less apt to be run into or cause an accident, and that all things considered, it lends itself to adoption of a uniform manner more than any other type of 'Stop' and 'Go' signal.

We are in hopes that these accomplishments, when brought to a successful conclusion, will in themselves, be a means of preventing thousands of accidents and saving hundreds of lives."

Qualities That Make Garden

We have seen a garden as full of interest and charm as any elsewhere, and nothing went into it but seeds and good sense and patience. Only one of these commodities can be purchased in the open market. The others come of caring enough for living beauty, for the companionship of growing things and for honest grubbing in the friendly earth. If you have the gift for these things you may also have a garden, and the neighbors will come from near and far to envy it.—Philadelphia Record.

Substitute for Glass

There are already on the market several schemes for avoiding the danger of injury resulting from the breaking glass in automobiles in case of accident, but what is claimed to be the most practical comes from England. It is called vitreo-colloid. It is a chemical composition which is said to be so flexible that it cannot break, is colorless, noninflammable and absolutely clear and capable of being worked into various shapes for many different purposes.

May Finger-Print Checks

Michigan banks may soon require finger print indorsement in cashing the checks of strangers if they subscribe to a recent suggestion of the Michigan Bankers' association. "No honest stranger will object to this method and no crook will comply, as they recognize it is positive identification," a bulletin says.

WITH THE HOME BUREAU CLUB LADIES

The Newville Township Club met Wednesday, July 9th, with Mrs. Lester Pierman. The meeting was called to order by the president, Mrs. Priest, followed by a song, What a Friend We Have in Jesus. The secretary's report was read and approved Mr. Stinson gave a good talk at this time on business matters for the club and on culling chickens, which was very interesting. It was moved and seconded to have a culling demonstration sometime in August. The ladies of the club are going to start the basket to make a little money for the treasury which will be watched with interest.

A debate was given by Mrs. Irvin Ginther and Mrs. Roscoe Conine on the affirmative; Mrs. C. S. Priest and Mrs. J. H. Kling, negative. The topic discussed was "Resolved that the housewives of today are happier than they were 50 years ago.' The affirmative won only by a close share. We were favored at this time with a song, "Neath the crust of the old apple pie" by Robert Pierman. Two encores were also given, The long naie and Doughnuts. Mrs. Irene Myer and Mrs. H. H. Murphy gave short talks on 50 years ago. Nine visitors were present and all the members but one. Next meeting will be held with Mrs. J. H. Kling, August 21st. Each member is urged to be present. Bring a friend with you.

GOOD BREEDING STOCK PAYS

Does good breeding stock necessarily mean Pure Bred livestock? In my judgment it does not.

However, the foundation of practically all good breeding stock upon the average farm traces to Pure Bred livestock. In a great many cases a good herd or a good flock of animals can be traced largely to the influence of one or two good breeding animals which were used for foundation material.

The success of a great many constructive livestock breeders has been due largely to the fact that the breeder built upon a certain foundation. As a result, when the herd was developed if the sire that was employed mixed with one of the individuals in the herd or flock the combination was usually successful with most of the individuals in the flock.

Too many men have been disappointed in the Pure Bred business due to the fact that they have tried to get in too rapidly. Often they have bought a large number of individuals that carried Pedigrees regardless of the real individuality or production records back of them. In most of these cases the men would have been happy and would have made progress and been successful in the Pure Bred business had they given more attention and possibly a slightly larger investment to one or two good foundation animals.

Some of the younger generation in Boys' and Girls' Club work have made some remarkable successes in this field of livestock endeavor. Their success, however, has been due largely to the fact that in most cases great care was exercised in the selection of the animals that made the foundation for their herds.

Great temples are not built in a day, neither are prepotent constructive herds of livestock assembled in a day.

The breeder who grows into the business comes out successful while the man who buys in often is sorely disappointed.

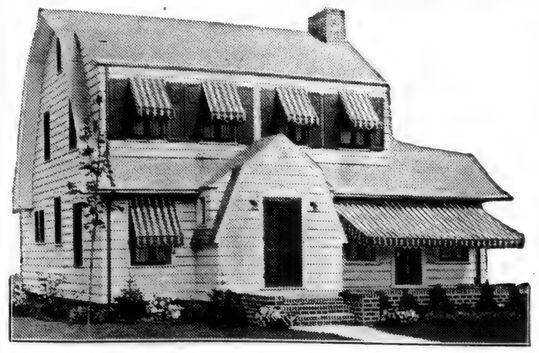
This Unusual Home Has Features That Will Appeal to Home Owner

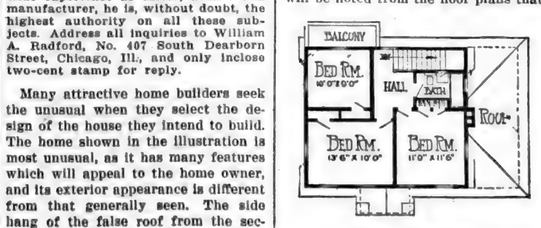


The side hang of the false roof from the second floor gives this frame home a rather unusual appearance. It contains six rooms and bath and is 26 feet wide and 22 feet deep. The kitchen projects out from the rear giving opportunity for a balcony connected with one of the bedrooms on the second floor.

By W. A. RADFORD

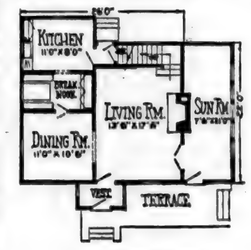
Mr. William A. Radford will answer questions and give advice FREE OF COST on all subjects pertaining to practical home building, for the readers of this paper. On account of his wide experience as editor, author and manufacturer, he is, without doubt, the highest authority on all these subjects. Address all inquiries to William A. Radford, No. 407 South Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill., and only inclose two-cent stamp for reply.

Many attractive home builders seek the unusual when they select the design of the house they intend to build. The home shown in the illustration is most unusual, as it has many features which will appeal to the home owner, and its exterior appearance is different from that generally seen. The side hang of the false roof from the second floor gives it a rather unusual appearance. The house contains six rooms and bath, is 26 feet wide and 22 feet deep. The kitchen projects out from the rear, giving opportunity for a balcony connected with one of the bedrooms on the second floor. Another unusual feature of the house is the brick floored terrace with the door leading into the sun room, which is 21 feet long and 7 feet 6 inches wide.



Second Floor Plan.

The rooms in this house are rather larger than is ordinarily found. It will be noted from the floor plans that the living room is 13 feet 6 inches by 17 feet 6 inches. An open stair leading to the second floor runs out of the rear corner of the living room. An open fireplace sets in the outside wall between the living room and the sun room with double french doors on one side leading to the sun room. The dining room is at the opposite corner and between it and the kitchen is a large breakfast nook. Upstairs there are three bedrooms and the bathroom and a large central hall with more than the usual number of closets.



First Floor Plan.

Without the overhang of the roof and the extension which provides the sun parlor this house might be termed a dutch colonial except that it has no central hall as is usual in this type of home building design. The whole is a roomy house, the interior laid out so that the work can be handled conveniently, and from the exterior appearance will give a home which will be individual in character.

Adapt Architecture to Style of the Locality

Can America adopt modern architecture and, at the same time, preserve those distinctive features that have been developed through centuries in the colonial mansions of the South, the red brick homes of New England, the Spanish-influenced buildings of the Southwest, and in other widely scattered regions?

The answer, unlikely as it may seem, is "Yes," according to Walter H. Kilham, widely known architect, who points out in the American Architect Magazine that the feat is being accomplished in New England.

At Westborough, Mass., the recently completed town hall has followed a design of clean modern lines and strikingly effective angles without rejecting the deep red brick walls or slate roofing which has marked New England architecture for centuries. In conservative Boston an outstanding industrial building has similarly adapted the modern idea to local atmosphere and materials.

Mr. Kilham warns American architects and the public interested in architecture that America, because of its wide range of climate, topography and other regional differences, cannot expect to create a single nation-wide style of modern architecture, or to borrow one bodily from any European nation. A building effective in flat Kansas would seem entirely out of place in rolling New England or among the oaks of Louisiana, he points out.

"Modern design, if it lives, must possess the element of appropriateness," he says. "The Gothic, for example, with its large windows and pointed roofs, was appropriate in northern countries, but did not flourish in the South. Similarly, modern design cannot confine itself to flat roofs and corniceless walls if it is going to survive in America. If it is able to assimilate pitched roofs, double-hung sash and local materials, its great principles of clean lines, lustrous surfaces and freedom from useless decoration should assure for it a brilliant career, and one which will take full advantage of the decorative possibilities latent in the play of light and shade on clean walls and the projection of colors on flat or curved surfaces."

Rot-Proof Woods Best

Decay attacks indoor as well as exterior wood trim, so for that reason it is well to use those woods that are decay-resistant.

White pine, sugar pine, chestnut, cypress, redwood and spruce are the soft woods that fall in this class. Other woods, widely used for trim because they take paint and enamel especially well, are basswood or whitewood, red or sweet gum.

Foundation Is Weak Spot in Older Houses

A house is just as good as its foundation.

Before you buy a house you should start with the basement and examine the house and walls for water stains and horizontal water lines caused by water seepage or water standing in the basement.

The foundation and retaining walls should be inspected for proper thickness. A minimum width for main foundation of one or two stories should not be less than 10 inches thick, if of concrete; 13 inches if of brick and 18 inches if of stone.

Concrete walls that have a sandy or clay appearance are deficient in cement or else are constructed of bank sand and gravel containing a large percentage of loam. Such walls should be examined for sand and loam pockets, which are detrimental to the wall's structural strength and permit the entrance of water.

The wall plate or mud sill which lies directly upon the foundation and upon which the floor rests should be minutely examined for dry rot. This is generally the first member of a dwelling's superstructure that goes bad.

Here's How to Prevent Mortar Efflorescence

Permanence of mortar color in the joint depends not only upon the pigment selected, but also upon the mortar with which it is mixed. Too frequently a good job of brickwork is spoiled by the use of a mortar that fades the color or that leaves a white scum of efflorescence on the mortar joint.

One material, said to eliminate this condition, contains none of the strong acids, alkalies or salts that are sometimes used and cause fading and efflorescence. A small amount of mineral oil used in this material is a further protection to the color, because it prevents moisture from penetrating the mortar and bleaching out the pigments.

Stops Floor Vibration

When floors vibrate, causing china and glassware to rattle, it is an indication that the joists are not deep enough for their span. For instance, perhaps 8 by 8s were used when 2 by 10s would have been better. The joists cannot be removed; therefore it is necessary to shorten the span. This can be done by placing a 4 by 6 at right angles to the joists and supporting this by two 4 by 6 columns from the ground. These should be wedged tightly so that the joists may be well supported.

Have you ever tried these safe, active suds?

"IMAGINE! I ran my washing machine only about half the usual time. And you ought to see how white my wash is!

"Rinso suds are so soapy and lasting, aren't they? In our hard water, too! I'll never need to bother with water softeners again."

Easier tub washing, too

The makers of 38 washers recommend Rinso for safety and for whiter washes. Great for tub washing, too. Soaks out dirt—saves scrubbing. How that saves the clothes!

A real economical soap. Cup for cup, Rinso gives twice as much suds as lightweight, puffed-up soaps. The only soap you need—for the wash, for the dishes, for all cleaning. Get the BIG package.

MILLIONS USE RINSO in tub, washer and dishpan

Be Boon to Mankind

"What's your husband trying to invent now?" asked the neighbor.

"An anti-skid soap that you can step on in the bathtub without taking a flop," sighed the wife.

Stuffed up inside?

Feen-a-mint is the answer. Cleansing action of smaller doses effective because you chew it. At your druggists—the safe and scientific laxative.

Another Einstein Theory

Professor Einstein's theory of life, he expresses thus: "Never forget that the fruits of our work are not final in themselves. Production is meant to ennobie and make our lives easier, to give our lives a touch of beauty and refinement. Never should we allow ourselves to be degraded into mere slaves of this thing we call production."—American Magazine.

Unfortunate Soldiers

No British officers were shot for cowardice during the World war, according to the statement of the war ministry, which added that 264 soldiers were shot for desertion, 18 for cowardice, 2 officers for desertion and one officer for murder and desertion.

All the Same Now

"I didn't know the new stenographer was left-handed."

"She isn't—she's just engaged."

COULD HARDLY DO HER WORK

Strengthened by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Mission, Tex.—"I have used a good deal of your medicine and always find it gives wonderful help. I was feeling so weak and miserable that I had to lie down very often and I could hardly do my housework. I read in the paper how Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound had helped other women who were in the same condition so I said I will try it for myself. I am very much better now and I recommend this medicine, and will answer letters from women asking about it."—Mrs. J. W. Albertson, 1015 Miller Avenue, Mission, Texas.

THE STORY

Renewing a childhood attachment, Ernestine Briceland, of a wealthy family, is attracted by Will Todd, newspaper artist, son of a carpenter. They lunch together and recall their school days.

Lillian was ash blond, and very lovely. Her eyes were a kind of deep violet, serene calm eyes, and her lips were thin and bright red, beautifully cut. Her nose was patrician, her skin a clear milky white, and she wore just enough rouge to give her a faint rose color and make her eyes more lovely. The two girls plunged at once into the conversation of sisters, without beginning or end.

"I've been to the matinee with Sadie and Juel. Sadie's seen Delancey's show ten times. She's as crazy as she can be. Imagine falling in love with an actor. She's written him letters and letters. But he won't see her."

"She is kind of old for that line," said Ernestine, perched on the edge of her bed, a silk stocking in her hands. "I saw Will Todd today."

"Will Todd? Who is he?"

Ernestine reminded her, and Lillian admitted that she remembered.

"He's charming," Ernestine said. "I thought I'd ask mamma to invite him here for tea some afternoon, or for dinner, some night when he doesn't work."

Lillian stared, then laughed. "If you want to see him again, if you want an affair with him, don't tell mamma," she advised Ernestine, "or that will be the end of it. A little lame boy about the house one summer is quite a different matter from an attractive grown man. Mamma will make him miserable."

Ernestine considered this. "I don't see why," she said stubbornly.

"Certainly you see, darling," said Lillian. "We are not to have any irregular affairs now. We are to marry."

"Well," said Ernestine, "what of it? You can't marry unless you're asked. I can be friends with Will without marrying him, can't I?"

"I doubt it," said Lillian calmly. "You always go to such extremes, Ernestine. You are always blundering around, taking such awful chances and making wild friends. You've been spoiled and have had your way about lots of things. But this is one thing you can't have."

Ernestine pooh-poohed Lillian, but felt at the same time that she would say nothing about Will just now.

"Beth's going to be married. She's going to marry Johnnie Allison."

"I'm not surprised, are you?" asked Ernestine, thinking of Will's gestures—the way he moved his hands continually.

"No, I'm not surprised. It's just what she wanted. One ought to know what one wants. I do. We talked about it today."

"I can tell you what you want without talking to you about it," said Ernestine with sisterly decision. "You want a house in Hubbard Woods, or else one of those big co-operatively owned apartments on the drive, near downtown. And you want a limosine, and a rich handsome husband. You've got it all planned out."

"In detail," agreed Lillian, unperturbed. "Pretty much as you named it. I want Loring, for myself—"

"Why don't you ask him?" exploded Ernestine, her feelings a confusion of resentment that Lillian had showed her the fallacy of her own dream, of hurt for her sister, that Loring should have been such a fool, of scorn for these plotters.

"I probably won't need to," Lillian answered, and went on, before Ernestine could interrupt her again: "If not Loring, then somebody much like him. I merely mentioned him as an example. After I've been married a few years, I want a son, and if I get along nicely, I wouldn't mind a daughter. I want everything right. A man who is already a member of good clubs, so that the money he makes will take us in the right direction, and we won't have to stand and wait. All right, go on and hoot. I know what I want, anyhow, and that's more than you know." She looked at Ernestine with some severity, and added darkly: "What's more, I'll get it. Watch me."

Ernestine could see Lillian as she had planned it all out. A correct house, a correct husband, perhaps even a correct baby or two. The same old business over and over, with correct people coming and going and Loring stalking handsomely about.

Not for her. She knew what she wanted. She wanted love! She wanted something not mentioned on Lillian's list. She wanted passionate, romantic love. She wanted adventure, an inevitable great adventure.

Suddenly she stood trembling, her heart beating with great strong strokes. She was terrified with the intensity of her feeling, with the vivid, almost material picture of Will Todd's violent personality before her. One person, one in all the world, and never anybody else. She wanted love, and all her wakening instincts warned her that she had found it.

CHAPTER II

The Lady Promises

Again and again Ernestine resolved to tell mamma all about Will, but again and again her confidences faltered before mamma's bright energy, before mamma's staccato bossiness. It was really her first secret from her family, and she did not feel right about it. Of course she was old enough to have a friend if she wanted one, a friend of her own choosing, but Lillian's attitude that she was having an "affair," a romance on the side, purely for the thrill of it, dismayed her. Yet she couldn't tell mamma, and an incident occurred which sealed her silence.

She had called Will on the telephone the next morning after her encounter with him on the street, and that had been the beginning of an absorbing intimacy. He worked in the afternoon and at night six days a week. He had nothing better to do with his forenoons and his luncheon hour than share them with Ernestine. But the very time of these engagements made

"But You Know Just How Papa Would React to Will Todd."

Ernestine safe from curiosity. It was a time of day exclusively the property of women in mamma's world. It would never have occurred to mamma that a love affair could have proceeded during a succession of forenoons.

And a love affair was what it rapidly became. Ernestine could not prolong the time with Will enough to suit her, and his eagerness soon matched, then outrode, her own. His enthusiasm, his energy were compelling, and Ernestine felt the rousing and stirring of her own personality in touch with his. Within a week she was desperately in love. She had no room for any thought and feeling but those which concerned Will Todd. Presently she realized that the termination of their friendship would be a true catastrophe, and with this realization she began to practice secrecy with skill and determination.

One blowy, gusty Sunday morning in December she had escaped church and met him and talked, hand in hand, as they always talked, quickly, starvedly.

Eventually a little silence fell between them, and in its magic, without speaking a word, they turned and kissed each other, and smiled a little dimly and leaned together. The touch of lips, and then the pressure of cheek to cheek was magic. His arms slipped about her, and for a long, long time they sat in a swing of joy.

There was no word spoken, no promise, but Ernestine knew now that she must tell mamma. The family was home from church when she reached the house, sitting in the big living room, all of them engrossed in gossip. Mamma looked at Ernestine sharply.

"Why didn't you come to church?"

"I went for a walk," evaded Ernestine, and her face flamed with color, for they all looked at her, and she felt that Will's love-making was visible upon her. Mamma said no more, however, and Lillian turned to her with the news.

"You remember I told you Sadie Hall was in love with the actor, Lon Delancey?" Ernestine nodded, and Lillian said with some satisfaction, "Well, she finally succeeded in meeting him, and they were married last night. Every one was talking about it in church this morning."

"Well, what of it?" said Ernestine. "She can marry him, can't she?"

"Ernestine!" said her father sternly. "You know it isn't suitable." He was a big man, a little too stout, with a handsome florid face. His brown eyes were warm and kind, but his big nose was acquisitive, his mouth stern and hard, a man of brilliant mind, but limited by prejudices.

"It is her money he wants," said papa, "and nothing else. The girl's a fool, and was not brought up properly, or she would never have done such a thing."

Loring put in his oar. He was always there on Sundays, thought Ernestine, who was tired of having him around.

"Any man who urges a girl to keep her love affair a secret from her folks is a blackguard, and a girl may as well realize it first as last. No real man would do such a thing. He would be honorable." He looked at her when he said it, with such meaning that Ernestine felt a faint dismay.

"But how ridiculous," she exclaimed. "You all know, every one of you, that if she had told her folks of her infatuation, they would have carried her off to Europe, or had him forced out of town. They would have separated them instantly."

"But that's why she ought to tell her people," said papa. "No girl can trust her own judgment, when she gets out of her own class. Her people know best, and she should confide in them."

All this while mamma had been watching Ernestine. Mamma was so pretty, with her violet eyes, and smooth fair hair, and her slender vigorous body. But mamma was sharp.

"Neither of my girls would do such a thing," she said now in her soft quick voice, but with a meaning that Ernestine and Lillian both sensed. "I am sure that neither of my little girls would do such a thing to me—have a secret love affair. Would either of you?"

"Don't be nutty, mamma," advised Lillian, and Ernestine was silent.

Later, alone, Lillian turned to Ernestine eagerly.

"You'd better come across. I think the folks are on to you."

"You haven't told them?"

"Of course not," said Lillian impatiently. "It's your own business. But, Ernestine, you aren't really going to fall in love with him, are you? Papa would be furious."

Ernestine shook the bright tears from her eyes and smiled at Lillian. After a moment, Lillian went on uncertainly.

"Loring saw you yesterday morning. He asked me who the young man was, and I told him, but asked him not to mention it. Still he may tell. He's awfully fond of you, Ernestine. He's always telling me that you are just like a little sister to him. He might feel it his duty to tell papa about you and Will."

"But there's nothing about Will that anybody could object to," protested Ernestine. "I'm not engaged to him, but if I should become engaged, I don't see who could care. He's fine and good and gentle. He's brave, too a real man."

Lillian shook her head.

"It's your funeral," she said, with the heartless laissez-faire of her generation, which feared, above all things, that it might become its brother's keeper. "But you know just how papa would react to Will Todd. He's the son of papa's old carpenter. He's poor, and he hasn't been to school, and he's not very strong—there's nothing but objections to such an idea, Ernestine. Anyhow, I can't see why you could let yourself even think of such a thing as getting engaged. Imagine taking a chance like that!"

* * * * * * *

Will said nothing about marriage. He was full of talk, overflowing with his own vitality, enraptured with Ernestine's beauty and dearness. One day, however, when they had gone for their usual walk north along the lake shore, he seemed oddly silent and thoughtful, and at times he looked at her, as though wondering whether to speak his mind or not. When he left her, he kissed her again and again, and said oddly, "Remember me," as though it were farewell.

"I'll see you tomorrow," she whispered to him, and turned her fur collar up against the wind.

Motorist Learned That Small Boy Was Correct

Humor can be found even in parking difficulties. A Brooklyn motorist had circled two blocks in an effort to find a place to park the other night. He was taking his family to a neighborhood motion picture show and already was ten minutes late for the feature picture. Finally he sighted an ideal space near the theater. Speeding up ahead of other motorists he stopped and started to back into the space.

"You can't pawk heah, mistah," volunteered a fat negro boy from the curb.

Ignoring the negro boy, the motorist completed backing his car into the space, then looked out and angrily demanded:

"What's the matter with you? What do you mean, I can't park here?"

"Nothin', mistah, nothin' at all," replied the lad with a frightened look as he hastily walked away and revealed a fire plug upon which he had been sitting and which had been concealed from the view of the driver.—New York Sun.

"Message to Garcia"

At the time that Hubbard wrote a foreword for an edition to "The Message to Garcia" he said that 40,000,000 copies had been distributed and that it had been translated into Russian, German, Spanish, Turkish, Chinese, Japanese and Hindu.

Famous Homing Pigeon Strains

The homing pigeon traces ancestry to three types: The Smerle, a Belgian bird with strong homing instinct; the English Dragoon, famous for its physique, and the Camulet, which can fly for hours.

MOSES, A COURAGEOUS LEADER

LESSON TEXT—Exodus 1:8-14; 2:1-23; 3:1-14.

GOLDEN TEXT—By faith he forsook Egypt, not fearing the wrath of the king: for he endured, as seeing him who is invisible.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Moses Doing Hard Things for God.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Moses' Call to Leadership.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Daring the Impossible.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Leader, Liberator and Lawgiver.

I. The Enslaved People (1:8-22).

After Joseph's death Israel quickly grew into a nation. The amazing growth of the nation aroused the envy and fear of the new king.

1. Heavy measure of service (vv. 10-14).

Cruel taskmasters were placed over the men, forcing them to labor in building treasure cities as well as in field service. However, the more they afflicted them, the more did they multiply and grow.

2. The midwives were ordered to murder the male infants.

This measure also failed, as the midwives feared God and chose to obey Him.

3. Commanded that the male children should be cast into the river (v. 22). In God's providence this mandate failed.

II. Moses, the Deliverer, Prepared (2:1-22).

1. His birth (vv. 1, 2).

Both his father and mother were of Levitical stock. Being of the same tribe, they would have a common bond of interest and sympathy. There was something striking about the child which caused his parents to believe that he was sent of God.

2. His preservation (vv. 3, 4).

Because his mother had faith she did not ignore the proper use of means. She was doubtless familiar with the place where Pharaoh's daughter came to bathe and believed that somehow through her the child would be saved. She placed the ark of bulrushes at the particular place where it would attract attention. Though the hand of God was directing in the carrying out of His plan, the steps in the process were entirely natural.

3. His education (vv. 5-10).

Moses was educated, first at his mother's knee. Here his mind was filled with the word of God and acquainted with the Jewish hopes and prospects. Doubtless here the indomitable purpose was fixed "rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season" (Heb. 11:24-26). Again, he was educated at the Egyptian court where he became acquainted with all the wisdom of the Egyptians (Acts 7:22).

4. His exile and marriage (vv. 11-22).

Moses was obliged to take his flight from Egypt at the age of forty, because he attempted to enter upon his work as the deliverer of his people (Acts 7:25). He was conscious of his mission, but was mistaken as to the time. His rejection by his brethren was a type of Christ's rejection by the Jews. During this time of rejection he secured a bride. Jesus Christ, his great antetype, while now in the place of rejection by His brethren, is getting a bride from among the Gentiles. Just as Moses after awhile returned and delivered his people, so will Christ return and deliver His people, the Jews, who rejected Him.

III. Moses Called to Deliver His People (3:1-14).

1. The Lord spoke from the burning bush (vv. 1-6).

It was while keeping the flock of his father-in-law in the desert that the Lord appeared to Moses in the vision of the burning bush. This bush, enveloped in flames, yet unconsumed, symbolized the people of God enswathed in the very fire of God.

2. Moses' commission (vv. 7-10).

In this commission God showed His active interest in His people. Because of His grace He obligated Himself to deliver them out of the hand of the Egyptians and bring them into the chosen land; therefore God commissioned Moses to bring forth the people out of Egypt.

3. Moses' objections removed (vv. 11-14).

Four objections were offered, each one of which God met and removed. (1) Personal unworthiness (v. 11). (2) The difficulty of the people to understand Moses' relationship to God (vv. 13, 14). (3) Unbelief on the part of the people (4:1). (4) Lack of eloquence (4:10).

Value of Religious Belief

I should prefer a firm religious belief to every other blessing; for it makes life a discipline of goodness, creates new hopes when all earthly hopes vanish, and throws over the decay, the destruction of existence, the most gorgeous of all lights; awakens life even in death.—Sir Humphry Davy.

Community Building

Main Street of Town No Place for Highway

If the New York Central railroad went through every town down the main street, as it goes through Syracuse, the Twentieth Century would take a week to get to Chicago. Arterial highways are now practically railroads, in purpose and potential speed of traffic, still attempting to function while passing through the main streets of every town.

They have got to be taken out of the towns. Send them over wide rights of way, radiating from the cities and crossing the states, and three enormous advantages are gained at once. First, through traffic is greatly facilitated in movement. Second, existing towns are reclaimed to live their local life in accordance with their ancient plan of community coherence and dignity. Third, an expanding population, pressed out from the cities and made mobile by the motor car, can move in and out daily over these rights of way, turning down the side roads to new communities built under zoning laws and in the country, where there is room for decent planning.

Owing to the present choked condition of our highways, suburban living is restricted almost everywhere to half its potential range and half its proper elbow room, while village living has lost its character and charm. The country is rapidly being spoiled for tourists, and there is no compensating gain in the flow of industry or expansion of living range. We are being conquered by the motor car. It is our blind master.—Walter Prichard Eaton in the Atlantic Monthly.

Things to Keep in Mind When Modernizing Home

Home modernization may be a relatively small thing—the substitution of a fire-safe roof for a burnable roof, for example—or it may be extensive, involving drastic changes in the arrangement, equipment and architecture of the house.

But whether modernization is a small or large job, it tends (1) to increase the real value of the house, (2) to increase the owner's enjoyment of it, (3) to tone up the whole neighborhood (just as a shabby house can depress a neighborhood), (4) to increase the family's appreciation of the house as the center of its living, and (5) to make the home a safer, more convenient place in which to meet the exacting demands of today and tomorrow.

One condition, however, governs the effectiveness of modernization. Unless the work is done in terms of permanence and as an investment its benefits will be short lived and correspondingly unprofitable.

Shrubs Transform Grounds

William A. Beaudry, a Chicago landscape architect, tells how the barren grounds around the St. Gabriel church and school were completely transformed within a few months. And when he had finished the story Mr. Beaudry made this sage and encouraging observation, based on more than twenty years of study of landscaping around public buildings: "I have never seen growing things destroyed around public buildings where the trees, shrubs and flowers are properly planted and cared for. The meanest man and the most ruthless child seem to respect well kept plants in their community and often take a great pride in helping protect them."

Loss by Cheap Construction

In securing the financial means for building, the very first and most important requisite is honest construction and material. If the house is well made, it stands virtually as its own security.

Those who slight their work and material are trifling with one of the noblest impulses of the human heart, and are making sport of one of the prime forces of national greatness. Those who build faithfully and well are real patriots, for they are contributing to the solidarity of the nation and the welfare of the people as a whole.

Modern Homes in Demand

The average person wants a home that is up-to-date. He wants to live in a house that has modern fixtures, hardwood floors, well-arranged rooms, tiled baths and clean cut graceful lines. When he finds a place of this sort he is eager to rent or purchase it.

Homes that are modern are always in demand. They sell more easily in the slow market. The house that is difficult to sell or rent is usually the old-timer that has no modern conveniences or with fixtures and accessories that are out of date.

Trees Repay Care

Although most of us appreciate the great value of our trees we often forget that they need care. As a result, many of them are diseased and starving to death. We know it takes years for a large shade tree to grow, but still we allow them to suffer from neglect. When we consider the large quantity of leaves, seed and wood matured by the average tree every year we can better realize that it cannot thrive without a good supply of plant food.

THE BEST BOOSTER FOR YOUR BUSINESS IN DeKALB COUNTY

ST. JOE NEWS.

NEWS MAKES A GOOD PAPER, SO SEND IT IN TO US.

VOL. XLIV — ST. JOE, DeKALB COUNTY, INDIANA, THURSDAY, JULY 24, 1930 — NUMBER 30

MORE MARRIAGES AND DIVORCES IN INDIANA

Washington, D. C., July 18.—The department of commerce announces that, according to the returns received, there were 43,800 marriages performed in Indiana during the year 1929, as compared 40,960 in 1928, representing an increase of 2,840 or 6.9 per cent. In 1916, there were 33,521 marriages performed.

During the year 1929 there were 8,159 divorces granted in the state, as compared with 7,885 in 1928, representing an increase of 274 or 3.5 per cent. In1916, there were 5,636 divorces granted. There were 79 marriages annulled in 1929, as compared with 93 in 1928.

The estimated population of the state of Indiana on July 1, 1929, was 3,202,000, and on July 1, 1928, 3,176,000. On the basis of these estimates the number of marriages per 1,000 of the population was 13.7 in 1929, as against 12.9 in 1928; and the number of divorces per 1,000 of the population was 2.55 in 1929, as against 2.48 in 1928.

The number of marriages was furnished by the state legislative reference bureau and the number of divorces and annulments by the county. The figures for 1929 are clerk of the circuit court of each preliminary and subject to correction.

In DeKalb county there were only 240 marriages in 1929 compared to 259 in 1928. There were 42 divorces in 1929 compared to 27 in 1928.

SPENCERVILLE MAN DIES SUNDAY

E. H. White, 79, died at his home north of the school house, Sunday following an illness of nine weeks, due to a complication of diseases followed by a light stroke. He had not been in good health for several years.

Besides the widow, he leaves four children, Irvin White of west of St. Joe; Mrs. Roy Harper and Mrs. D. A. Vendrely, both of near Spencerville and Albert, of Amarillo, Texas.

The funeral was in charge of Roscoe Walter, held from the home, Wednesday afternoon at 2 o'clock, Rev. J. N. Scholes, officiating. Burial was made at Payne, Ohio.

SHERWOOD GRAIN ELEVATOR RAZED BY $20,000 FIRE

A grain elevator destroyed with estimated at nearly $20,000, four other buildings damaged and one man overcome by smoke and heat—that was the toll recorded Monday as the result of a blaze early Sunday that for two hours threatened to wipe out a large part of Sherwood.

The P. J. Leithauser elevator, in which the spectacular blaze originated burned to the ground. Mr. Leithauser today declined to estimate the extent of his loss or the amount of insurance he carried on the building.

Negotiations had been completed with a group of farmers in the vicinity of Sherwood for purchase of the Leithauser elevator for use in the federal farm board's co-operative storage program, it is said in well-informed circles here. The transfer was to have been made early this week at a price reported to have been in the neighborhood of $18,000.

Cause of the fire generally was attributed to spontaneous combustion in the chaff room in the basement. Grain in storage was said to include 200 bushels of wheat and some oats.

Loss to the building of the Moats Motor Sales, across the street, due chiefly to windows broken by heat, will not exceed $50, while damage to other buildings consisted only of scorched shingles where roof fires started by sparks were quickly put out. These included the residences of Andrew Whippert, back of the Moats garage and across the street from the elevator; Edward Renz, two blocks east, and Emerson Miller, near the Cincinnati Northern tracks on the street leading to Crystal Fountain Park.

Hicksville, Paulding, Ney and Defiance fire trucks assisted the Sherwood department in keeping the blaze from spreading. That a number of other buildings were not destroyed was attributed to the response of these towns and also to the fact that there was little wind.

George Hulbert, an employe of the Community Carnival company, was overcome while helping fight the fire and required medical attention.

Two other carnival employes saw the flames breaking out of the top of the elevator at about 1:30 A. M. and notified Night Marshal A. L. Stailey. He turned in the alarm, and the siren on the town hall summoned firemen and village residents.

A large crowd soon assembled and at times difficulty was experienced in keeping the people back so the firemen could work.

The office building near the elevator was considerably damaged.

It was 4:30 before the flames were extinguished.

BEAUTIFUL WEDDING OF HELEN WOODCOX AND RALPH DEXTER, AT LISCO, NEBRASKA

The following is taken from the Lisco, Departmnt of the Garden Co., Nebraska, News, giving details of the Helen Woodcox wedding. Miss Woodcox is the daughter of E. L. Woodcox, a former St. Joe boy.

"A very beautiful wedding ceremony uniting Miss Helen Woodcox of Lisco, and Mr. Ralph Dexter of Beatrice, Nebr., was solemnized at one o'clock at the home of the brides parents, on Saturday, July 5, 1930. The ceremony was performed under a beautiful bower of white streamers and pink rose buds, occupying the corner of one of the spacious living rooms of the Woodcox home. A bank of ferns, flowers and Baby Breath formed the altar rail, and the rooms were all decorated with flowers and rose shaded lights.

"Mrs. Frederick Dexter played "A Song of Love," and Mrs. Kenneth Brolyer sang "Thine Alone," accompanied by Miss Carolyn Hays. As Miss Hays played Lohengrin wedding march an aisle was formed by the ushers and bridesmaids carrying long white satin rbbons, through which the bride and her father and the maid of honor marched. They were joined at the altar of flowers by the groom and his attendants. The father gave the bride away.

"The bride wore a beautiful dress of rose colored Georgette and a rose lace hat. She carried a large bouquet of pink rose buds, sweet peas, and Baby Breath. Miss Olive Leuthuser of Beemer, Nebr., Maid-of-Honor, was dressed in a rose lace gown, and carried pink roses. Misses Mary Ellen Maginnis of Kimball, Natalie Butherus of Sidney and Margaret Brown of Lewellen were bridesmaids. Miss Maginnis wore pink chiffon, Miss Butherus wore green chiffon and Miss Brown was dressed in orchid Georgette. Little Doris Woodcox, sister of the bride, and Ray Brooks, young nephew of the groom, led the bridal couple to their places. Kenneth Brolyer of Marysville, Kans., was best man, while Frederick Dexter, brother of the groom, Paul Brown and Francis Brown of Lewellen, were ushers.

"Rev. O. D. Hoagland of Oshkosh pronounced the words which joined this happy young couple, using the beautiful double ring ceremony.

"During the reception which followed the marriage a trio was sung by Mrs. Frederick Dexter, and Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Brolyer, "I Love You Truly." Refreshments were served after which Mr. and Mrs. Dexter left in their car on a wedding trip, from which they will return later and spend the rest of the summer at Lisco.

"Mrs. Dexter attended St. Patrick's academy for four years and took one year's work at the University of Nebraska. She was pledged to the Alpha Omicron Phi sorority. She is accomplished and highly esteemed by a large circle of friends.

"Mr. Dexter attended the high school at Marysville, Kans., and is a graduate from the University of Nebraska in the 1929 class. He is a member of Theta Chi Fraternity and was a member of the University track team. Last year he was principal and coach of the high school at Litchfield, Nebraska."

REWARDS PAID FOR CATCHNG BANDITS

D. E. Witmer of Grabill, Ind., representative of the Standard Oil company of Indiana, was in Auburn Thursday and gave Sheriff John Armstrong, Chief of Police Davis and Night Patrolman Henry West checks for $50 each and the same amount to R. E. Smith, attendant at the Standard Oil station at the corner of Main and Twelfth streets, for assisting in the arrest of Henry and Louis Vrielynck and August Beruyneel, who robbed the attendant of $119.53 on Easter Sunday.

The men were given sentences of ten years each in the Indiana reformatory by Judge Endicott.

Ward Keller, deputy sheriff at Bryan, and Leroy Siders, Bryan chief of police, also received checks for $50 each for assisting in the arrests. After fleeing from Auburn the bandits headed toward Bryan and were captured west of the city.

The same filling station was help up recently by a lone bandit but he has not been captured.

ABEL REUNION

The second annual reunion of the Abel family was held Sunday, July 20, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. W. Lehr Wilder at Coburn's Corners.

The home and land was formerly purchased from the government by Homer Abel, the great grandfather of Mrs. Wilder.

After a bountiful dinner a short program was furnished. Song, America the Beautiful; welcome, Beverly Barnes; solo, Carolyn Williams; reading, Alice Hart; reading, Mrs. Miser; duet, Mayellen and Carolyn Williams; reading, Mrs. Woodward; interesting talks concerning the Abel family was given by Wallace Abel, Fremont Abel, Charles Lake and Alice Hart.

GRAIN SEPARATOR DESTROYED BY FIRE

Vernon Kline is the loser of several hundred dollars by the loss of a grain separator about 1:30 Thursday morning by fire.

For thirteen hours, the separator had been set ready for threshing on Thursday, and had not been run or any one near it. When the fire awakened Mrs. Kline it had completely enveloped the machine. Help was summonsed by phone from the neighborhood and Vernon carried water trying to keep the fire from spreading to a straw stack near by. Had it been discovered later, chances are that all the buildings would have been destroyed.

The origin of the fire is a mystery.

Hammer Mill Now in Operation

We have just completed the installation of our new Hammer Mill and are now in a position to give you grinding that the community around St. Joe has been waiting for.

It is equipped with a powerful Electric Magnetic Separator that all grain passes over before entering the mill and removes all bolts, nuts, nails, wire or metal of all kinds, which is a most important protection to your stock.

WE put this grinder in for YOU, now make use of it.

Give it a arial and you will come back for more grinding.

Come down and see for yourself what we are doing

Air Route Islands

A Vista in Barbados, West Indies.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

THREE island domains that seem destined to take on new importance with the development of air traffic were passed over by the Graf Zeppelin on its recent triangular voyage from Europe to South America, to North American, and back to Europe.

The Cape Verde islands were sighted first. They lie far from the usual ship lanes and are visited by few travelers. One globe-trotter pronounced them "the most uninteresting place I have visited."

It is true that the Cape Verde islands do not compare with the exquisite Canaries, nearer Europe, in beauty, human interest, faunal features, or salubrious breezes. Baedeker ignores them. Yet, now that they are taking on new importance as land falls on aerial routes, the islands may be rescued from innocuous obscurity.

The naturalist would find on one of the islands a seabird unknown elsewhere and a plant-eating lizard. The student of economic geography would be interested to work out the reason why the inhabitants of one of the group, Brava, have developed a land-owning propensity which leads them into constant legal wrangles, while a spirit of "come what may" and indifference to ownership of anything infests the other islands.

The islands recently developed their trade to a point where the state department established a new consulate on the island of Sao Vincente (St. Vincent).

St. Vincent is one of the 14 islands of the group which form a crescent about 300 miles west of Dakar, the easternmost city on the African continent. Porto Grande, capital of St. Vincent and one of the few large port towns in the islands, is built in a well protected location with high mountains at its back and in front the massive heights of the Island of St. Anthony almost shutting in a wide, deep harbor from the sea.

Total Area Is Small.

The 14 islands could be placed on the state of Rhode Island and only a few rugged edges would extend over the borders. Sao Thiago (St. Jago), the largest of the Cape Verdes, is slightly smaller in area than the city of Los Angeles, while the smallest island is measured by square yards.

All the larger islands are inhabited, the majority of the population being quartered in compact villages and towns built in small recesses in the steep mountainsides, overlooking the sea. But it is in the interior of the larger islands that one finds the real native life of the Cape Verdes. It is said that the ancestors of these people of the interior once lived along the seashore. But for a hundred years after Spain took control of the islands the Cape Verdes were plundered by pirates. During this period the inhabitants fled to the valleys from which they seldom emerged except to trade. Most of these valley people are black but one often notes Portuguese features. They speak a poor quality Portuguese which is difficult for the European to understand.

Like Greenland, the name Cape Verde is deceptive. It was taken from Cape Verde, Africa, and in good English means "Green Cape," but there is little on the islands to suggest that the Cape Verdes deserve to be called "Cape Green Islands." Here and there along the shore and in a few interior valleys are patches of fertile land, but rocks and sand claim the greater portion of the area. Fresh water has always been a luxury, lack of which has caused serious famines in the past.

Natives Are a Busy Lot

That the natives make the best of their barren islands is indicated by the fact that they produce indigo, coffee, castor beans, fruits, tobacco, poultry, potatoes and yams. Salt is also an important product. Many of the inhabitants who are not employed in agriculture or shipping, are good fishermen and adept in making rum, curing fish and manufacturing straw hats and seats.

When the islands were discovered more than 500 years ago by two Portuguese sea captains, they were devoid of human life. The only excitement was the occasional overflowing of a volcanic crater. The latest eruption occurred in 1680.

For more than 200 years the Cape Verdes built up a flourishing trade and became Portugal's principal outpost of trade with Africa. Until the middle of the last century the natives reaped a harvest from the African slave trade. This probably accounts for the majority of negroes in the present population of about 140,000. Those inhabitants who are not black are Portuguese or of mixed blood.

In the early days when New England was famous as a whaling center, many of the crews of the whalers were recruited in the Cape Verdes. Those who did not return to the islands settled in southeastern Massachusetts in the vicinity of New Bedford. "Bravoes," the name by which they are sometimes known, comes from the name of the island from which most of the recruits migrated—Brava, the southwesternmost island of the Cape Verde group.

Barbados Densely Inhabited.

Quite different is Barbados, one of the most interesting and less well-known of Great Britain's possessions in the Western Hemisphere. Pear-shaped, solitary, farthest east of the West Indies, Barbados generally is accounted the most healthful of the group, even though it is the most populous country in the world, per square mile, except China; and although George Washington carried to his grave the marks of the smallpox contracted on a visit there.

The island—there is but one despite the misleading plural name—is but an eighth the size of our Rhode Island, but has twice as many inhabitants per square mile as our smallest and most densely populated state.

Seldom does a volcano become an asset. But volcanic eruptions have contributed largely to the fertility of Barbados. When the sun was obscured throughout one day in May 1912, the Barbadans were panic stricken; but when the gentle rain of black dust subsided, the deposit was found to be ashes from an eruption of St. Vincent's Soufriere, nearly 100 miles to the west, and an enrichment for the soil.

Hot, Dusty Bridgetown.

Bridgetown, the island capital, is a hot, dusty city of about 30,000 people. It is especially busy on Fridays when planters flock to town for business and buying. Its cathedral was built principally by funds obtained from a lottery authorized by the legislature, after the original building had been blown down by a hurricane in 1780.

Labor is so plentiful that men compete with beasts of burden. But this condition was greatly improved by the use of considerable Barbados labor in building the Panama canal.

The third important island visited by the Graf Zeppelin was Porto Rico. But it was really San Juan, the capital city, rather than the island to which the great air liner paid its respects. After cruising over the city, it turned sharply northward and put out over the Atlantic.

San Juan has a population of more than 114,000 and has nearly doubled in size since the island came under American control. It was from San Juan that Ponce de Leon set sail, like another Jason in search of the Golden Fleece, for the fulfillment of his charming, if boyish, dream of finding the Fountain of Youth, which, we all recall, resulted in the discovery of the southernmost end of the United States.

San Juan was a settlement half a century before St. Augustine, Fla., the oldest town in the United States, came into being, and a full century before the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth Rock it began to take on the semblance of a city. More than two and a half centuries before the United States began to build the White House in Washington, Spain started the construction of the Casa Blanca, the governor's palace.

The SANDMAN STORY

ABOUT THE ELEPHANTS

"I'VE a better memory than you have, said Mr. Elephant.

"I suppose you're right," said Mrs. Elephant.

"Ha, ha," said Mr. Elephant, throwing his trunk up in the air—but not losing it entirely, "now I know something."

"What do you know?" asked Mrs. Elephant.

"I know that I can talk to you and that you are feeling gentle and quiet. That's because Miss Elephant's a month old."

Miss Elephant had taken all of the time and attention of Mrs. Elephant, but now Miss Elephant was old enough to look after herself a little. And, too, her mother didn't have to worry about her. As she didn't have to worry about her, she wasn't so nervous, and so could be gentle and pleasant once more.

"In your nervous days," said Mr. Elephant, "you would have objected to being told that I had the better memory, even though it is true."

"Oh, yes, I feel free of worry, now," said Mrs. Elephant.

"I think," said Mr. Elephant, "that I shall sing a song to Miss Elephant.

"Then I shall tell her an Elephant Jungle Bedtime story. But I will only tell it to her. No one else shall hear it.

I must sing the song now:

You wee big thing,
You wee big thing.
Hearken to your daddy,
Sing, sing, sing.
I'd trumpet and call
For my baby so small
And she'll go to sleep
And ne'er a tear weep.
Her elephant eyes
Will go a-bye-byes.
You're an adorable hunk,
And your dear little trunk
Is a joy to behold,
The world should be told
Of your beauty and charm.

Mr. Elephant didn't sing (as he called it) any more then, for Miss Elephant had fallen asleep and was having a little nap.

So he went on talking to Mrs. Elephant.

"I like to bathe in the summer, but I must say I don't care about it in the winter," continued Mr. Elephant. "It seems a foolish time of the year to bathe."

As the keeper knew they felt that way about it, he gave them oil baths in the winter and kept them fine and clean, too.

The oil baths were to keep their skin from cracking, which it would have done in the warm buildings where they lived in the zoo. When the elephants are free they can look after their skin and see that it gets oiled—for it needs to be oiled just as our skin needs soap and water. They go into the swamps which are oily, and in that way they get the oil they require.

When the elephants are free they keep their nails in good condition by climbing over rocks, but in the zoo or in the circus—when in captivity—the keeper has to cut their toe nails for them. There are no rocks and rough places for them to walk over in the zoo.

"I've learned some new tricks," said Mr. Elephant, "and the keeper is going to teach some of them to you and Miss Elephant, I believe."

"Ah, I'll go back to school again," said Mrs. Elephant, who was much pleased, for elephants keep on going to school even when they are grown-up. Elephants' school means where tricks are taught.

"No time for more talking now," said Mr. Elephant, as he threw his trunk high over his head—but not so it was away from him—"here comes our supper, hay and water! A supper fit for a king, or a president, or an elephant family!"

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

DROPPING FOOD

IN THE Maritime Provinces of Canada they say that dropping food on the floor is a sign that some one is telling lies about you. But the general superstition in the United States is that dropping food while eating is a sign that some enemy grudges you your food. The omen in both versions of the superstition is that an enemy, because of this dropping of food, will work you ill. That this is a superstition inherited from our primitive ancestors is proved by the fact that a similar superstition is prevalent today among peoples living in a primitive state.

In Africa all the food left over from a meal by the King of Loando is carefully collected and buried and in New Guinea, Florida island, the New Hebrides and other pacific islands the natives carefully collect and destroy or bury all the remnants of food scattered about the floor of the hut after a meal. The act is not one of sanitation but is performed with the idea of preventing an enemy from getting hold of the food fragments and through them working magic of a harmful sort upon those who have partaken of the meal.

In India a native who wishes to injure an enemy gives him to eat of a dish of rice and then takes up what is left and throws it into a fish pond. If the fish greedily eat of the rice the enemy's doom is sealed. The "spell" works by sympathetic magic—what is done to the food carelessly dropped and left lying about reacts upon the food just eaten and consequently upon the eater. It will thus be seen how dangerous it is to drop your food on the floor where an enemy can get hold of it or some grave accident happen to it, and thus produce by sympathetic magic a case of acute indigestion or something worse.

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

"AMENDE HONORABLE"

"HE MADE the amende honorable, after which, matters proceeded smoothly."

This is an idea we frequently see clothed in the language indicated, the implication being that the person referred to, having in some way offended, did whatever was required of him to pacify those he had wronged.

The amende honorable might be a public admission of false accusation, coupled with an apology and a retraction. It might be acknowledgment of injury unwittingly done and compensation therefor.

Curiously enough, this significance of the expression is quite a reversal from the trend of its original meaning.

Formerly, the "amende honorable" was simply a particular form of punishment meted out in France to deliberately disgrace traitors, parricides and sacrilegious persons, the meaning it conveys today being a development of that which it once had, as stated.

UNIFORM TRAFFIC LAWS

DURING the past ten years 170,000 lives were lost in automobile accidents. The number of injuries was nearly six million. The economic loss, estimated in terms of physicians' bills and waste of time, was $6,000,000,000.

Various explanations of this serious condition have been given—speed, inexperienced drivers, carelessness, intoxication and criminal negligence. All the fatalities however cannot be assigned to any one of these causes. Many of the wrecks were accidents in the true sense of that term. They were unavoidable even when the car was driven by an experienced and expert driver.

L. A. Barrett.

Efforts to lessen the number of automobile accidents was the absorbing topic at a recent conference in Washington. A definite decision was reached to the effect that efforts will be made at once to secure uniform traffic laws. This is one of the difficulties which needs immediate correction. It is extremely difficult for a driver passing from one state into another, or even from one county into another, to know what laws govern traffic in that particular locality. As an illustration, in some localities a driver is permitted to turn left on a green light, in another locality, this is strictly forbidden. Passing through a white or yellow light is permissable in one place but is a violation of the law in another. The very same difficulty applies to U turns. It has been estimated that a motorist could be arrested about 250 times in driving from Washington to New York, if he drove in strict obedience to the traffic laws of Washington.

Efforts will also be made to make it compulsory for every driver to procure a license which is to be granted only upon proper registration and after a rigid examination has been successfully passed. The problem of speed seems to be the most perplexing one. This of course can only be regulated by strict enforcement of the traffic limit law. If this degree of speed could also be standardized, it would do much in solving that very difficult problem.

All success to every new movement which seeks to make the highways more safe.

PROVISIONS FOR WEEK-END TRIP

Everybody Enjoys Outings Which Are Inexpensive.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

There is now one motor vehicle for every five persons in the United States, according to the United States bureau of public roads, or one for every family. There is no doubt but that a great number of families of moderate means who would not have dreamed of taking frequent week-end outings a few years ago are now able to enjoy the possession of a car and the opportunity to use it for recreation in the open air.

Considerable distance may be covered in a Saturday-noon to Sunday-night trip, or more leisurely driving to favorite nearby picnic or camping grounds may be preferred. From the mother's point of view such outings are a blessed release from the former drudgery of Sunday spent cooking and clearing up the biggest dinner of the whole week. Everybody enjoys them, and with a little planning they may be both easy and inexpensive.

Keeping Quality Important.

In planning what food must be carried, as three or four meals will probably be eaten on the road, the prime consideration is the keeping quality. Unless some sort of traveling refrigerator is taken along, it is best to select for the second day's meals foods that do not require icing to be palatable or safe to eat. A small camp cooking kit is a very satisfactory part of the week-end equipment. It should include a frying pan and a saucepan, a coffee or tea pot, and some plates and cups suitable for serving hot foods and beverages.

An electric icebox hooked on the back of a car to preserve foods while on outing trips.

For the first picnic supper one may choose among the entire range of fresh cooked meats or chicken, or if the weather is cool, bring hamburg patties or chops to broil over the camp fire. Salad ingredients like tomatoes, lettuce, celery and cucumber may be carried, to be put together when wanted, or potato salad made at home and brought in a glass jar or cardboard carton. Except for tomatoes and cucumbers, which keep well because of their skins, none of these foods should be planned for the second day. The more perishable fruits, such as berries, cherries, fresh pineapple cut up and put in a glass jar, or fresh apple sauce, are best the first day. Hot coffee and ice cold milk may be brought from home in thermos bottles. If lemon juice is squeezed and sweetened ready for mixing into lemonade it will be a refreshing beverage to serve. If sandwiches are wanted, have them the first day. Loaf cake, cup cakes and cookies all travel well, especially if put in a tight tin box.

Camp Fire Dinner.

For a camp fire dinner the second day, the bureau of home economics suggests frizzled dried beef and scrambled eggs. Both the "makin's" for this dish can be safely transported without ice. Let the boys of the family help to cook this dish. With it have tomatoes or cucumbers, and buns, either plain or toasted, as they will not dry out as much as loaf bread. Fruit for dessert on the second day may be oranges or whole pineapple, cut up in sections when wanted. Some of the cake from the day before may be left.

A good hot dish for supper the second day will appeal to everybody. A vegetable chowder may be made of potatoes, bacon, or salt pork, canned or dried milk, onion, and celery if possible. Or one of the excellent canned chowders, reheated on the spot, may be depended on, with crackers as the breadstuff. Cheese may be served at this meal, with the crackers, and marmalade or jam. Bottled grape juice will be good for a fruit drink the second day.

In the picnic kit, in addition to whatever cooking utensils are liked, one might keep permanently a bottle opener, can opener, bread knife, table knives, forks, spoons; plates and cups of metal, or paper; paper napkins and waxed lunch paper; salt, pepper, loaf sugar, a small can of evaporated milk —and a box of matches for the camp fire.

THE MOTOR QUIZ

How Many Can You Answer?

Q. Why is it customary in the Philippines to hire chauffeurs?

Ans. The operator of a motor vehicle which injures a pedestrian is subject to arrest and imprisonment until he can prove that he is blameless. For this reason most of the car owners employ a chauffeur.

Q. What is the motor vehicle registration of the Philippines?

Ans. Approximately 29,000.

Q. How many cars are registered in Canada?

Ans. 1,076,819 or one car to every nine persons.

Q. What effect is produced by "choking" the carburetor?

Ans. Pulling out the "choke" causes a raw mixture of gasoline to be drawn into the engine, which fires readily in cold engines. Excessive use of the "choke" causes fuel waste, sooting, oil dilution, fouled spark plugs and irregular running of the engine. When the "choke" is used properly, according to the instruction book, and the spark plugs are in good condition, starting should not be difficult even in the coldest weather.

Belgium to Start Eight Production This Year

Production of new eight-cylinder cars in Belgium is expected to start, in quantity, during the current year, according to a report received and issued by the automotive division of the Department of Commerce. This shows that production in Belgium during the past year was 6,000 passenger cars and 1,000 trucks. There was a considerable increase in the number of six-cylinder cars at the expense of four-cylinder cars. The new models of Minerva eight-cylinder cars are expected to reach quantity production during the current year.

AUTOMOBILE NOTES

A young hitch-hiker in the neighborhood reported a lame shoulder, after the week-end, from swinging a thumb over it.

• • •

"Let me see something that's gone 187,000 miles," said a college boy to the man on a used car lot. "I haven't the time to break one in."

• • •

With these automobiles that get up to 240 miles an hour, we assume you jog along at a nominal 190-mile gait, the first 500, to get them properly broken in.

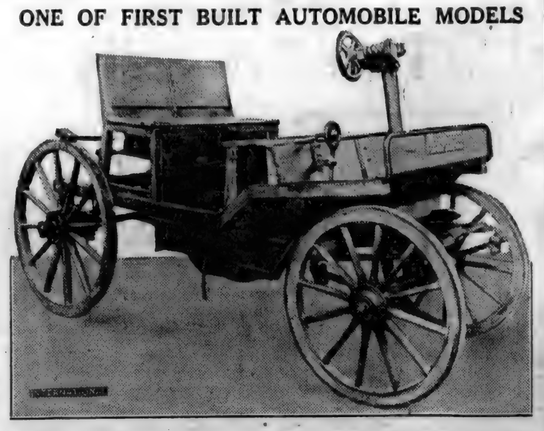
• • •

A Wisconsin lad completed a high school course in a year by doing everything four times as fast as usual. This would require driving the coupe 280 miles an hour.

• • •

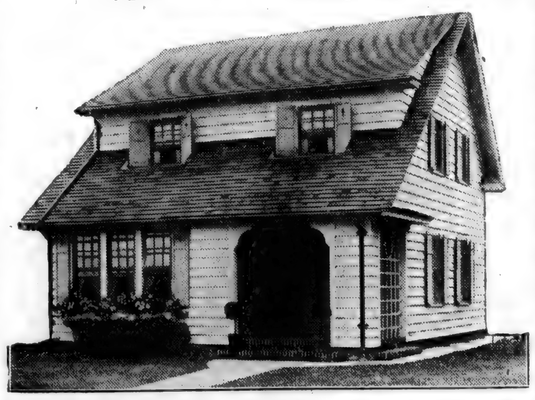
Another rather jolly impasse is when a local driver, accustomed to making inside left turns, meets a visiting motorist who is equally accustomed to the outside type.

ONE OF FIRST BUILT AUTOMOBILE MODELS



This truck-like vehicle, now carefully preserved in the Vienna Technical museum, was one of the earliest models built by Siegfried Marcus, first to use a gasoline-driven motor in an automobile. It was constructed in 1875. Note the rear wheel brakes and the de luxe shock absorbers.

Attractive Small Cottage That Typifies the Real Spirit of Home



Here is a little cottage which seems to typify the spirit of home. Its story-and-a-half construction has been designed to produce a charming outward appearance and the interior will be found equally satisfactory.

By W. A. RADFORD

Mr. William A. Radford will answer questions and give advice FREE OF COST on all subjects pertaining to practical home building, for the readers of this paper. On account of his wide experience as editor, author and manufacturer, he is, without doubt, the highest authority on all these subjects. Address all inquiries to William A. Radford, No. 407 South Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill., and only inclose two-cent stamp for reply.

Where your house is to be built is almost as important as building it. The particular size of lot, with the particular frontage or natural advantages which you want may not be available to you for several reasons. The kind of neighborhood, the distance from transportation, the conditions as regards paving, sewer, gas and electricity, etc., are some of the things that will govern your selection of a homesite. So we say pick out the place you want to build before you attempt to choose a house plan.

Having done that and with the lot in mind, try to find a house that will fit it. If it is a narrow lot, then you must have a narrow house; if it is a shallow lot, then you must find a plan that is not too deep from the front to back so that it will not merely go on your lot, but will leave a little room for a back yard and perhaps for a flower or vegetable garden, too.

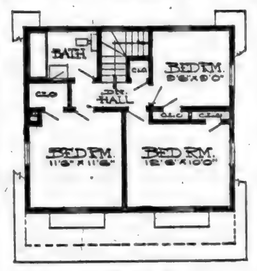
It is only by using a complete plan, too, that you can get a definite estimate on the cost of building your home. All other figures are but guesses and it is dangerous to guess when building, no matter how experienced in building the guesser may be.

The proper person to give you a definite, reliable estimate on your home is your local lumber dealer or builder. Consult him; get the benefit of his advice on homebuilding conditions as they obtain in your community. He will tell you and his counsel will be as reliable as any can be, for your permanent satisfaction is his concern and he will see that you get it.

Finally, remember that in homebuilding as in everything else, you cannot have everything you want.



Second Floor Plan.

Compromises have to be made somewhere and probably more have to be made when building a home than in anything else.

As a suggestion to those that are contemplating building a home, here is a small cottage which seems to typify a real spirit of home. It is a story-and-a-half construction and has been designed to produce a charming outside appearance and the interior will be found equally satisfactory. The house is small, the dimensions being 20 feet by 26 feet, but it contains six good-sized rooms. The living room extends the depth of the house and is reached through the covered entrance porch. It is 12 feet 6 inches wide and 19 feet long. At the front, to the left, with three windows at the front and one at the side, is the dining room, 12 feet by 12 feet 6 inches. At the rear is the kitchen 12 feet square.

An open stairway leads from the rear of the living room to a central hall on the second floor opening off of which are three bedrooms and a bathroom.

The broken roof lines of this house with the dormer-like windows gives it the appearance of a much larger house than it really is. It provides plenty of room for a good-sized family and is of the type that is most economical to build.

Termites Menace to American Buildings

The wise American home-builder of today will expend a few extra dollars to make his house termite-proof if he really wants it to last. If he doesn't he may awake some day to the realization that a perfectly sound looking joist or section of flooring has been eaten away inside by these tiny white ants which have invaded the country in armies of billions in the past 30 years.

This warning is offered in the American Architect Magazine which points out that all of the United States, with the exception of the northernmost states and the area between Lake Superior and the Rockies, has already felt the effect of the termite invasion.

The tiny insects have always been a menace to furniture as well as buildings in Africa and other tropical and sub-tropical countries, but only in recent years have they, for some unaccounted reason, become important in the temperate zone.

Living in underground nests of millions, situated just below the frost line, they bore their way up and into any wooden structure which is connected with the ground. They rarely eat their way through the wood but continue to bore inside. Instances have been found where huge joists, comparatively new and apparently as strong as ever have been found to be mere shells filled with fine sawdust as a result of the termite's activities.

The only known way of checking the pests, says the American Architect article, is to interpose metal sheaths and concrete, through which they cannot bore, between their underground nests and the wood of the building.

In warm, damp climates the termites have been know to literally devour furniture from the inside. The only means of eradicating them in these cases is to place the furniture in a room made air-tight and filled with a hot, dry heat until the pests are killed.

Labor-Saving Units in Home Help Housewives

Labor-saving inventions are being developed and placed in the home so fast that the housewife should give serious study to the value of each before installing it, says the household research bureau, discussing how to economize on time, energy and patience in the average residence.

"Take a kitchen and storeroom census, first of all, and note how many practically new pieces of equipment are stored away now," says the bureau. "Business organizations analyze their methods and equipment, discarding all operations that involve unnecessary cost.

"Modern homemakers should analyze their work in just the same way. One should consider what the actual saving in time, labor or money, or all three, will be, before purchasing any new piece of equipment. Expensive devices used only a few minutes now and then generally cannot justify their cost. They do not indicate efficiency in buying.

"On the other hand, certain items of equipment are so useful there is no question about the wisdom of adopting them," says the bureau. "A good vacuum cleaner quickly pays for itself by saving labor, time and floor coverings."

Attic, Basement Waste Space in Most Homes

A study of the modernizing opportunities for dealers in the attics and basements of old homes, made by the National Lumber Manufacturers' association, shows that in an average six-room house of about 23,750 cubic feet inclosed by walls and roof only about 15,000 cubic feet are given over to space used for such common domestic occupancy as resting, eating, sleeping, recreation, entertainment, cooking and the like.

Of the remaining 8,750 feet, 5,600 are found in the average cellar or basement and about 3,150 in the attic.

Make Profitable Use of Time to Get Results

Sometimes we are so utterly dull and out of touch with the stimulus of life that we complain how time hangs upon our hands. The truth is, time neither flies nor remains still. It moves onward at exactly the same rate today as it did a million years ago. What is happening is an alteration in our reaction to time. All these points of view arise out of a changed state of our mind. One moment we see things one way—the next the same things have an entirely different color. That is why, one day, time seems to be fleeting, and another to drag.

Time is always with us, and all we have to do is to occupy ourselves in a way that will produce the best and greatest results. This means thinking on a constructive basis, so that every moment of life is spent in such a manner as to have in it but a minimum of waste.—Exchange.

Uncover Ancient City

The French government and Yale university are uniting in the work of uncovering the ancient city of Doura on the Euphrates river. The scientists have been excavating for about a year and the objects unearthed are said to have thrown new light on the little-known era of 300 A. D., as well as the obscure Parthian civilization.

Up to the present time the finds consist mainly of parchment records, of no importance in themselves, being mostly minor legal documents, but of great value in supplying names of officials and other data of the city.

Cold!

"I want to buy a wedding ring."

"We have them from five shillings onward."

"Haven't you any cheaper ones?"

"Yes, we have them at three shillings each, but then you must take a dozen."—Fliegende Blaetter.

Makes Life Sweeter

Too much to eat—too rich a diet—or too much smoking. Lots of things cause sour stomach, but one thing can correct it quickly. Phillips Milk of Magnesia will alkalinize the acid. Take a spoonful of this pleasant preparation, and the system is soon sweetened.

Phillips is always ready to relieve distress from over-eating; to check all acidity; or neutralize nicotine. Remember this for your own comfort; for the sake of those around you. Endorsed by physicians, but they always say Phillips. Don't buy something else and expect the same results!

Civil War Necessity

Shinplasters, or fractional currency, were issued during the Civil war because of the disappearance of coin from circulation and the shortage of small coin. The first issue of fractional money was made on August 1, 1862. The last and fifth issue was made from February 26, 1874, to February 15, 1876.

Humanity is a virtue that we all admire—in others.

Restless Children

Children will fret, often for no apparent reason. But there's always one sure way to comfort a restless, fretful child. Castoria! Harmless as the recipe on the wrapper; mild and bland as it tastes. But its gentle action soothes a youngster more surely than some powerful medicine that is meant for the stronger systems of adults.

That's the beauty of this special children's remedy! It may be given the tiniest infant—as often as there is any need. In cases of colic, diarrhea, or similar disturbance, it is invaluable. But it has everyday uses all mothers should understand. A coated tongue calls for a few drops to ward off constipation; so does any suggestion of bad breath. Whenever children don't eat well, don't rest well, or have any little upset—this pure vegetable preparation is usually all that's needed to set everything to rights. Genuine Castoria has Chas. H. Fletcher's signature on the wrapper. Doctors prescribe it.

"Flies are Highly Dangerous"

Says The United States Public Health Service

WHEN children come down sick with typhoid or summer complaint, which kills more than 1/5 of the children who die under five, what is the cause? Often the disease has been brought into the home by flies.

Be comfortable and safe. Keep your home insect-free. Spray Flit, which is guaranteed (or money back) to be quick-death to flies, mosquitoes, moths, roaches, bedbugs and other household insects. Yet its clean-smelling vapor is harmless to humans.

Flit kills quicker if you use the special inexpensive Flit Sprayer. Insist on Flit and don't accept a substitute. Get yours this very day!

If you complain that there is nothing doing in your home town, one reason may be that you have done nothing for it.

Where is the fellow that says he prefers summer to winter? We can't locate any of them now, but they will show up next winter.

The agent for the Indiana Service at Avilla bid adieu to his j b Monday, but the cars are running just the same. But say it is heck when they leave the track and take off the trains.

Home coming dates are being announced all about us—but nothing has been done at St. Joe. Don't the folks wan the folks to come home this year?

The business concerns that depend upon their customers to advertise their stores, might be reminded that things that cost nothing are apt to be worth much more than that.

Well, the rain came in spite of the prophecies. Monday some argued that it could not possibly rain before Friday when a change in the moon was scheduled.

A new one: James Smith, 35, of Chicago, declared Sunday that he would outshine all the tree-sitting, bicycle riders, watermelon eaters, gum chewers, and the rest of the endurance addicts. On Tuesday, as a pleasant manner in spending the summer in addition to gaining himself public notice, Smith started for California. He will walk backwards.

The tree-sitting epidemic is reported to be on the wane in Chicago. Under the strain of a third day of 100 degree heat the boys in branches were considering a descent to the ground and normality. Officials said that the parent who allows his son or sons to engage in the endurance contests is lax in his duties, that the lack of exercise and proper food together with the danger of catching colds and perhaps pneumonia made the contests hazardous. Physicians declare that bicycle riding contests are a more normal and healthy form of amusement. But tree-siting has nothing to recommend to it except as an exhibition of how even the juvenile mind may suddenly yield to a sudden craze, even though it involves discomfort.

In a Chicago hospital and while under the nurses care, 2 families got their babies mixed and don't know which is which. They have called in seven experts who will scan the babies and examine the parents to ascertain which belongs to who, etc. It is said that they took finger prints of the parents, examined the shape of their heads and applied every scientific test to unravel the tangle. Why wouldn't it be a good way to solve the question by letting the children grow up and then see which looks like its father. Still there are draw backs in every plan but as a general rule their children would verify and choose their parents by their resemblance as age developed them. This question presents a chance for a modern Solomon to decide this complex. Why children resemble and why they do not resemble their parents, presents a subject that is debatable.

Some element in this country has been offended by Bishop Cannon's activities as a churchman and citizen, judging from the nature of the attacks made on him. It will be remembered that he went through a senatorial quiz and was criticized for dabbling on the board of trade and has been intimidated on several occasions because of his convictions. Now they accuse him of meeting the woman he just married in a lobby. It only goes to show that it isn't what is done that creates the opposition oft times but its who does it. Some peoples family tree can have most anything hanging on it and get away with it, while others who make a small mistake will be razzed to death. What the Cannon should do in this case is to load himself up and take a shot at the wood hammers that hecter his good intentions. It is a proven fact that the best apple trees always have the most clubs in them, and also that mean, contemptable people always throw stones at their best neighbors. Mean people disdain good people. They are a thorn in the flesh.

The senate ratified the Naval Pact, 58 to 9 on Monday and the ratification will now go to the President for his signature. It is a fact that few of the average citizens of the country actually know what the ratification terms of this pact are. In other words, we have left the results, as we Americans always do, with the leaders of congress, having faith in their ability to provide for the best in the best way.

There has been two dominant questions involved in the controversy over this pact, the question of saving millions of dollars for the American people by limiting navies and adequate defense made posible by a large navy, which makes possible our safety. Between these two points of discussion has hinged the controversy. The leaders of congress had come to the place in the political history of this country, where they felt more secure in reducing our navy without getting the country in a dangerous position internationally. While there is yet need of much precaution in dealing with all foreign powers relative to national defense, it is also plain that the politicians which have heretofore stampeded congress into letting contracts for many millions of dollars worth of battle ships to rot in harbor or be worn out by usage, can be said to be the other side of the question.

In ancient times as well as today the national defense of any nation must depend on its good will more for defense than its military preparation. History says so. This wild goose chase of nations in naval competion seemed to have no end, taxes were getting high and the agreement is the culmination of the experience of all the nations statesmen over the world who see in this naval competition nothing else besides a money making propposition for the rich. And navel experts agree that for the price of a single battle ship there could be built several hundred air planes that could whip a whole navy, in fighting equipment and man power. This can be said to be the first big step where nations actually trusted one another. Good will and morality of the citizenry of any nation is its greatest defense.

Tuesday, in signing the treaty, President Hoover says: "I have had great satisfaction in signing this naval treaty. I wish to congratulate you, the delegates to the London conference, upon the completion of your work. It is also a matter of satisfaction that this great accoomplishment in international relations has received the united support of both political parties and all the states."

The Human Torch

A blow torch in the hands of a mechanic working on a car in front of a garage suddenly exploded and the flames quickly enveloped the man's clothes. Terrified, and crying out in pain, he ran to the home of a neighbor who endeavored to beat out the flame with her hands. As a result, the fire was communicated to her clothing and to her house; she was burned, her home damaged and the mechanic was terribly scarred. Incidentally, two automobiles were also destroyed.

When clothing catches fire, according to literature published by The National Board of Fire Underwriters, one should get down on the ground or the floor and roll, in an attempt to smother the flames. If possible wrap a rug or other woolen material around the body, starting at the neck, to avoid inhaling the flame. When one remains standing he soon becomes a living torch, as the flames spread quickest in this position. Running is still worse, as that fans the fire to greater intensity.

The National Board's literature is widely distributed in an effort to reduce the suffering and losses from fire. Approximately 6,000 people die annually as a result of fires in homes, 31 per cent of the victims being women and children. Fire occurs in an American home every two minutes in the year, on the average. No further incentive should be necessary to urge the American people to protect their homes and families from the ravages of fire.

The Hiker Situation

Indiana motorists who have experienced trouble with "hitch-hikers," or pedestrians on the road signaling for a ride from motorists, are not the only people who have to contend with this nuisance. According to British newspapers England is experiencing considerable trouble and the English Government has issued a warning to motorists not to pick up persons indiscriminately, just as our own newspapers and motor clubs have, and are continuously, warning our motorists.

Otto G. Fifield, Secretary of State, has among the various reports that are filed with him from the Bureau of Motor Vehicles, a great many reports and complaints motorists have experienced with the road riding, begging, pedestrians. Mr. Fifield stated that if all persons soliciting rides were honest there would be little trouble, but one never knows whether the solicitor is a bandit, highwayman, or an honest person who is doing the asking, and motorists should not pick up persons indiscriminately.

SPORTING NEWS

High School basket ball games in Indiana next season will be played in four quarters of eight minutes each instead of two halves of 15 minutes each.

From the commissioner of the Indiana High School Athletic association came the announcement that the change from halves to quarters had been approved in a poll taken of the high school principals and adoption of the plan is certain.

Under the new rules there will be a rest of one minute between the first and second and between the third and fourth periods. There will be a 10-minute rest between the second and third periods.

The four quarter system is provided in the official Spalding rules which are used by the high schools of most other states and also in national tournaments.

Thorpe and landed in the creek without serious damage to either person. The car was removed Monday.

A demand for $10,000 damages is made in a complaint filed in the DeKalb circuit court by Lee Ports Holbrook of near LaOtto, against Dr. M. E. Klinger and Dr. C. P. Fox, both of Garrett. A son of the plaintiff, Ellsworth Holbrook, 11, died at the clinic in Garrett December 27, following the administration of anaesthetics for the extraction of a tooth. The complaint alleges negligence on the part of the defendants. The latter say the death of the boy was unavoidable.

For the first time in many years a bond was ordered forfeited in the DeKalb circuit court. The judgment is directed against Catherine and James T. Longbrake and Harry G. and Ruth Bohler of Garrett, and was entered upon the motion of Kathleen Longbrake Potter of Auburn, former wife of Ordeth Lonbrake. The latter was in court last October for failure to support his family and escaped serving a sentence by furnishing a bond of $1,000 to guarantee the payment of $12 a week. The order of the court has not been complied with and the sheriff holds a bench warrant for Longbrake's arrest, but has been unable to locate him.

Plain Draperies Against a Figured Wall Bringing Out One of the Dominant Colors in the Decoration Scheme.

Beth dear:

You certainly hit the tack on the head when you said your draperies were going to offer you a wonderful opportunity to get some color into your rooms. After all, the walls are bound to be more or less neutral. Upholstery fabrics, wall hangings and draperies offer you a big field.

Of course you know that glass curtains are those sheer transparent things which hang close to the window, insuring privacy and giving a soft, mellow tone to the sunshine that enters the room, keeping it from being glaring. Naturally they will want to harmonize with the walls and be rather in contrast to the draperies. They will be sheer, unless side drapes are not used. Fringe and trimming should be in keeping with the material of the glass curtain.

Dotted swiss is very good glass curtain material and may be used with cretonnes, chintzes, voiles and blocked linen draperies. Voile and swiss are very attractive when made with ruffles. Net, scrim and grenadine are other materials well adapted to draperies of the type I mentioned a few lines back. Silk net or gauze, however, are adapted to velour and damask.

Draw curtains are sometimes used with a pulley, rings, etc., to be drawn at night or any other time, when privacy is desired. They are usually made of some fairly heavy material such as cretonne, casement cloth or pongee.

Draperies may be made to harmonize with other appointments in the room without very much trouble. You may have the same material in your upholstering on the chairs and sofa. Rugs also harmonize with the draperies. Draperies, generally speaking, should hang within one inch of the floor. They may be hung from iron rods, wooden poles or from cornices. Valances may be used when there is no reason for wanting to lengthen the window adorned by the draperies.

The color scheme and the material used will depend upon the style of architecture and furniture, the purpose of the room, the proportions, the exposure and the type of windows you have. You see it is almost impossible to say draperies should be so and so. Write me about your windows and I'll try to be more helpful about the decoration of them.

Affectionately,
Fern Eture.

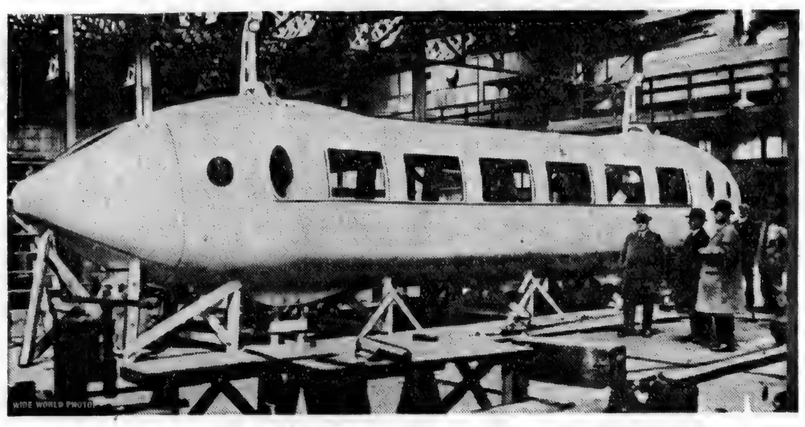
New System of Transportation in Scotland



A new system of transportation is to be tried out near Glasgow, Scotland, when the "rail-plane," the invention of George Bennie, will be demonstrated to the public. The coach, shaped like an airship, will be driven along overhead rails by a propellor at each end which will be electrically driven. The train will be capable of making a speed of 150 miles an hour. The photo shows the coach in the course of construction.

Lesson for July 27

DEBORAH, A LEADER IN A NATIONAL EMERGENCY

LESSON TEXT—Judges 4:1-24.

GOLDEN TEXT—Say to them that are of a fearful heart, be strong, fear not: behold, your God will come with vengeance, even God with a recompence; he will come and save you.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Deborah a Brave Woman.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Deborah a Brave Woman.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Notable Women Patriots.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Woman's Influence in Community and National Affairs.

The book of Judges covers the period from the conquest of Canaan and death of Joshua to the judgeship of Samuel. While Joshua and the elders of his generation lived, the people in some measure remained faithful to God, but the very next generation went into apostasy. Their declension may be accounted for by:

1. Their failure to drive out the Canaanites when they took possession of the land. Their failure to carry out this command of God was their undoing.

2. Their amalgamation with the Canaanites. Their tolerance of the heathen about them was quickly followed by union in marriage.

3. Idolatry. Their intermarriage with the heathen was followed by worship of the heathen gods.

In order to teach this lesson intelligently it is necessary that the teacher have a grasp of the book of Judges from which it is taken. In chapter 2:6-19 is given a synopsis of the book. Observe (1) The sin of the people (vv. 6-13). (2) God's judgment for their sin (vv. 14, 15). (3) Their repentance (3:9). (4) God delivers them at the hands of the Judges (vv. 16-19): A repetition of sin, oppression by the enemy, repentance, and deliverance, is the story of the book of Judges.

I. The National Emergency (vv. 1-3).

1. Lapse into Idolatry (v. 1).

Ehud was not only a righteous but a strong ruler. Under his judgeship, freedom had been enjoyed for many years. As soon as he was dead the people turned away from God.

2. The bondage of the people (v. 2).

The Lord abandoned them to be oppressed by Jabin, king of Canaan.

3. The people cried unto God (v. 3).

Affliction brought them to their senses.

II. The Judgeship of Deborah (vv. 4-10).

The great national emergency confronting Israel was met by a woman named Deborah. Her name means "Bee." As suggested by another, she exemplified her name by her industry, sagacity and great service to the public.

1. The place where she judged Israel (v. 5).

It was under a palm tree. She held an open air court for the administration of justice.

2. Her method (vv. 6-10). (1) Her summons to Barak (vv. 6, 7). Barak means "lightning." Deborah, being a prophetess, was able to select a man whose gifts would enable him to rally the forces needed to gain victory over the formidable foe. Deborah gave definite instruction as to the number of men and the strategy to be employed, assuring him that God would deliver Sisera into his hand. (2) Barak's reply (v. 8). He expressed an unwillingness to go unless Deborah would go with him. (3) Barak rebuked (vv. 9, 10). Deborah yielded to his request, but made it plain to him that it would detract from his honor as a conqueror, "for the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hand of a woman."

III. The Defeat of Jabin's Army (vv. 11-16).

Sisera, the captain, gathered a mighty army and went forth, confident of victory over the ill-equipped and undisciplined army of Barak, but he made one sad mistake—he did not consider that it was the Lord's battle (v. 15). Through supernatural interposition the enemy became panic-stricken (25:20).

IV. Sisera Killed by a Woman (vv. 17-24).

In his flight Sisera took refuge in Jael's tent. In the guise of friendship she committed a most heinous murder after inviting him into her dwelling.

V. The Song of Deborah and Barak (ch. 5).

This song was composed and sung in celebration of the marvelous victory which God had wrought. Deborah set forth in the most definite way that the secret of victory was the help of God.

Consecration

All truly consecrated men learn little by little that what they are consecrated to is not joy or sorrow, but a divine idea and a profound obedience, which can find their full outward expression, not in joy and not in sorrow, but in the mysterious and inseparable blending of the two.—Phillips Brooks.

God's Plan to Cleanse

God brings men into deep waters, not to drown them, but to cleanse them.—Aughey.

THE STORY

Renewing a childhood attachment, Ernestine Briceland, of a wealthy family, is attracted by Will Todd, newspaper artist, son of a carpenter. They lunch together and recall their school days. Ernestine's sister, Lillian, knowing their father would disapprove, urges her to end the affair, but Ernestine refuses. The love-making progresses rapidly.

But she did not see him the next day, although she waited at their rendezvous for an hour past the time. Nor the next day. By the third day she was filled with deep dismay and fear. All sorts of questions whirled through her mind. Perhaps he had tired of her. It might be that the affair had run out for him, that he had never intended to make more than a sweetheart out of her.

But she had only to think of his bright honorable face to know that there was some other reason behind his attitude. She had only to think of his eager kisses to know that he cared. She called him on the telephone at his home, at ten o'clock. His mother answered and said, in a low voice, that he was sleeping.

"Would you waken him. It's important," she said, and stood shaking in the telephone booth, until she heard his voice, husky with sleep.

"This is Ernestine," she said, trembling.

At once there was an electric silence, and then he said, in a voice now thoroughly awake:

"Well?"

She could have cried. "What's the matter, Will? Aren't you going to see me again?"

"Where are you?"

"I'm at the drug store, at Wilson and Sheridan."

"I'll be there within an hour," he told her.

He had not had breakfast, he said, shaking hands with her formally when they met. They went into a little white tiled coffee shop, and he ordered his breakfast and sat opposite her in silent waiting. He looked terrible. His face, often white, was ravaged, and his eyes burned. But he was calm. He had reached some decision, and Ernestine knew that the initiative rested on her.

"What's the matter, Will?" she asked him, trembling again, and hating herself for it. It was awful to be such a slave.

"Your mother phoned me yesterday."

"Mamma!"

"Sure—she asked me to come there to tea this afternoon. I told her I had to work. Didn't you know she was going to ask me? I thought perhaps you told her to invite me," said Will.

A little light dawned in Ernestine's mind.

"Is that the trouble?" she asked. "Do you think I ought to have invited you to my home?"

"Well," he said slowly, "why shouldn't you—unless you were ashamed of me?"

How could she explain without wounding him?

"But you see, Will—it has nothing to do with being ashamed. My first thought was to tell the folks, but then, it seemed they might disapprove of our friendship, and I want to keep it. And then—"

"But don't you see, Ernestine, I can't meet you any more, like this—out on the street, and in the library, and in restaurants and tearooms? I can't do that to your parents. If they don't want you to go with me, I can't coax you to do it—clandestinely."

"Your mother's been telling you all this."

"Yes," he said. "I confided in her. She showed me how it looks."

"Well, then, that's all there is to it. You aren't willing to make the effort to be friends that I am. You don't understand how they'd be. They'd be so nice and so reasonable—and they'd separate us. Just as sure as fate. You don't know them as I do. It wouldn't be your character they'd object to, or your folks. It would be your position and your lack of money and such things. Anyhow, it seems to be a little late to—to—" she faltered into silence.

Will looked at her with agitation.

"What do you mean—it's late, Ernestine?" he demanded.

But she could only look at him. If he did not understand, she could not explain.

"You mean—you care?" he asked a little breathlessly, and she smiled tremulously.

"What did you think?" she asked him.

"I didn't think, I guess," he said. "I never meant to make you love me—it was so natural. I shouldn't have touched you."

"But you did, Will."

"Let's go," he said, and paid the bill.

They walked out, swept now into a unity which had been increased, not broken, by their talk. They walked a half mile or so and came to a deserted boathouse, where they sat down side by side upon an upturned rowboat.

"You see, Ernestine," he told her solemnly, "we just kind of jumped into it all. But it's real with me. It's love—and marriage, with me. I never thought much about such things—just took you at what you were willing to give. Everybody has dates out around town, and I didn't want to go to your house especially, nor think about that. And then, we got to caring—and as soon as I began to think about you as my wife, I began to think about all these other things: your money, your family position, and the darned Briceland pride that I know more about than you do. And then, I wondered why you never took me home. And finally I talked to my mother. And I made up my mind to quit."

"Without even giving me a chance?" she asked him.

She was in his arms now, and he said to her:

"Will you marry me, Ernestine?"

"Of course. Today, if you like."

"You'll have to tell your folks first," he insisted.

"Oh, Will," she cried. "Don't stand with them against me. They'll separate us. Why do you suppose they asked you to the house today, if not to find out about you and how intimate our friendship had become, and to begin the business of breaking it up? I know." She told him what papa said about Sadie Hall and the actor Delancey. His arms grew slack about her. He sat a little away, now, distraught, silent.

"They'll think I've persuaded you. They'll think I want the money, that I'm seeking for myself," he protested. "If I thought you could live on what I make—but you don't know anything about money. You don't know how hard it is for two people—living on twenty-five dollars a week. I don't know what to do, but I want to do what's right."

He looked most forlorn sitting there, thinking, pondering, trying to contemplate a future without her, trying to reconcile his own pride and self-esteem with the position her family put him into.

"I should never have kissed you," he exclaimed. "I should never have loved you."

"Will," said Ernestine tenderly, "you couldn't help that."

For now his sad confusion had caught her in the grip of her first passion. Now she lived in terrible fulfillment the promise her throbbing heart had made weeks ago, when she had talked to Lillian about marriage. Her heart leaped in her like a thing threatened with mortal danger. She flung herself upon him precipitously, her arms strained round his neck. He caught her and held her close. All his being flared up in answer to her own emotion, and his lips sprang to hers in a kiss that was as new to them as though they had never touched each other before. It was a promise.

"Take me today, Will," she cried, and tears streamed down her face. "Now, quickly, before anybody can say a word to us, before they can be reasonable and reassuring and competent about us. Take me and hold me, now, quickly and secretly. I promise you I'll live on what you earn. I promise I'll take my chance with you—completely. I'll never let them have reason to say that you wanted anything but me. Whatever you have is all I'll have, Will. I promise—"

She was crying wildly. He was shaking, as she was, but he laughed a little, and wiped her cheeks with his own clean handkerchief.

"The lady promises, Judge," he said, and kissed her and laughed at her and teased her. "The lady promises never to sue me for more than a million a year alimony. The lady promises—"

He picked her up and set her on her feet.

"Come on, then—let's do it now," he cried, and seized her wrist and ran, pulling her along.

* * * * * * *

It was almost evening when Will and Ernestine came to the Briceland house. In the downstairs drawing room the lamps glowed softly. She had telephoned mamma that she was in town for lunch and would come out with Will at five. Beyond Lillian, Ernestine could see Loring's square shoulders.

They ran up the steps, hand in hand, and at the door Will gave her a reassuring hug and kissed her cheek.

"Let me do the talking," he whispered, and they went on into the hall and ran into the drawing and living room. Ernestine was aware at once that the swift kiss Will had imprinted on her cheek had been seen, for papa was flustered and hostile, and mamma looked at her in pale reproach.

"Mamma," said Ernestine, "do you remember Will Todd?"

Mamma gave Will her hand, and he moved awkwardly forward, looking shabby and ill at ease beside the magnificence and self-possession of papa and Loring.

"We've just been talking about you," mamma said to Will. "I didn't know until yesterday that you were such friends with my little girl. I'm sorry you haven't been here sooner."

Will murmured something, and Ernestine introduced him to her grandmother, who looked at him severely and gave a slight snort of recognition, and then Lillian came and offered him her hand and said she remembered him. The two men straddling the hearth acknowledged the introduction with silent handshakes. Mamma asked Will to sit down and rang for tea. Ernestine, full of guilt, sat down close beside him and turned to speak to mamma.

The conversation moved haltingly as they waited for tea. Papa, somewhat maliciously, asked Will about his father.

"He's well," Will answered in a calm natural voice. "But my mother has been almost an invalid for a year now. We feel very anxious about her."

"We are sorry to learn that," said mamma, and then went on quickly: "What have you two children been doing all day?"

There was a dramatic pause, but Ernestine took it up quickly.

"Mamma, you forget that I am twenty now."

They laughed politely. The tea-wagon came, mamma poured tea for them all, and they talked of things about which Will knew nothing. Ernestine could see how they were making him feel like an outsider. Sitting in the deep chair, his long legs drawn up before him, Will was not so disturbing. Her heart was full of tender loyalty.

"You have changed a great deal," mamma said to Will. "You used to be a shy little boy."

"I don't feel very shy today," he told her, and smiled at Ernestine.

His bright black eyes, like shiny bits of anthracite, under his white, domelike forehead, were beautiful, but Ernestine knew that the others could see nothing but his queer clothes.

"Tell them, Will," she said at last, putting down her cup and taking his from him.

They all stopped, and turned startled faces toward the two. Will squared himself and turned first to mamma.

"We've gone and done it," he said, smiling.

"Gone and done what?" asked mamma sharply, and her pallor startled them all.

"We've gone and got married—today."

"Married! Who?"

It was papa's voice, harsh, protesting.

"Ernestine and I," answered Will steadily, and Loring said, "Married!" in a hoarse, incredulous tone, and Ernestine, looking up, saw his face, as pale as mamma's, and as startled, with deep chagrin and consternation written on it. But none of the others noticed him.

"You see," said Ernestine gently, "we were engaged anyhow, and when mamma invited Will to tea, today, I thought we might just as well make it an announcement party."

"You thought!"

"Certainly, papa. It was my idea."

Claims Elephant Leads Beasts in Intelligence

The question of the relative intelligence of our so-called "dumb" beasts seems to be one to which there is no end. Wherever animal men gather the controversy wages hot and furious. "I think elephants are the most intelligent of all animals," says Hubbard Nye, writing in Liberty Magazine. "I realize this opens an argument, for every man who has worked in a circus or menagerie may think otherwise.

"My contention," continues Nye, "is that elephants show more intelligence in learning to work. In twenty minutes you can teach an elephant to plow a cornfield and not step on a single shoot. The big beast's intelligence shines brightest in vaudeville work. He is the only animal capable of going through his stunts without a trainer and without cues.

"The three-ton star will stand backstage waiting for his act for an hour and a half, placid, thinking his elephant thoughts, while property men shift scenery right under his trunk and chorus girls go scuttling around him. You can lead him between the most fragile sets of gauze, and he won't hurt a thing."

KNITTED ENSEMBLES FOR SPORTS; AFTERNOON FROCK IS IMPORTANT

SPORTSWOMEN who know fashion turn to the knitted ensemble as the costume ideal to wear when "playing the game." Incomparable, too, for tour and travel wear is the general verdict in regard to knitted apparel.

As to accounting for the increasing favor expressed for knitted fashions, knitted wear is itself its own best "reason why." The record of achievement during the past several years in the knitted industry reads like a fairy tale. Perfectly amazing things have been accomplished in the way of daintiness, lightweightedness, colorfulness and "style."

Those lacy frocks, for instance, flimy as a cobweb, which are being featured this year in the sports collections are actually knitted. And

The afternoon frock is again important in the fashion world. Was a time, not so long since, when we really forgot, or rather the style program did not demand that we change our clothes for each passing daytime social event. Sports, sports, how monotonous it grew to be wearing sports clothes for breakfast, luncheon, theater, bridge tea, and even dinner.

The real reason we did it was because there actually were no definite luncheon, afternoon and tea fashions. Having reached the point where sports clothes were accepted even by "the best of regulated" dressers as appropriate as anything, we sometimes became totally resigned, and just wore them on through the dinner hour.

Admitted that we were not picturesque or even particularly pretty thus those entrancing three-piece bouclette suits! Of course the woman who is assembling a wardrobe of swanky clothes will never think of passing up as fascinating a proposition as these knitted fantasies. Assuming that you have grown wise as to the importance of white for this summer, we suggest that one of the number of sports costumes which you hope to acquire be a three-piece all-white bouclette. You will fall in love with the blouse (worn over or as a tuck-in) which is included in these knitted trios—sheer and lacy as can be. To wear with this you are perfectly justified in choosing white hat, white footwear, gloves, a boutonniere of white violets, and a pocketbook also all white. It's a white season!

Of course if you yearn for color, then decide upon one of the adorable uniformed? We believe the answer is unanimously in the affirmative, or rather the negative—we were not!

To improve the point that all this is changed the illustration below shows a charmingly informal afternoon frock of embroidered durene cotton. It looks, as it should, according to the present call of the mode, decidedly afternoonish. One would never play tennis in such feminine attire, but one would eat a summer luncheon in it; or drink iced tea at five o'clock. One would sit on the country club porch playing bridge of a warm afternoon, but one would never play golf in it.

All of which goes to show that the clothes question is anything but a "happy-go-lucky" proposition this season. It requires intelligent study as to the appropriateness of things. The new rules are really quite arbitrary—pastel shades for the knitted three-piece, pale blue if you have been reading up on French preferences, or delicate pink if it's more becoming. However, see to it that all the accessories are white, for again let us remind you—it's a white season!

AN AFTERNOON FROCK

However all's not white and pastel tinted that's knitted. Just the thing for the day on the links is a rich green or radiant brown three-piece fashioned after the manner of the model in upper picture. The sleeveless jumper, with its surplice fastenings, is the very essence of chic. If you are fond of circular skirts, many of the knitted suits have them this season—capes, too, instead of jackets if such be your choice.

sports for sports, afternoon costumes for afternoon, and formal evening attire for just that and none other. Transgress the law as to what's what in wearing apparel for this or that time, place and event, and you are, well, to say the least, you are simply not fashionwise, not modern.

Notwithstanding some few objections voiced at the outset of this new regime, women are completely won over to this order of things which calls for "perfectly darling" summer frocks made picturesquely instead of "sportsy" of loveliest materials, chief among which are handsome allover embroidered effects.

SEASONABLE DISHES

A dish that is attractive and most tasty and one nice enough to serve on any occasion is:

Orange Jelly With Orange Custard. — Prepare a mold of orange jelly and when partly thickened beat well until light and foamy. Turn into a fancy mold and chill. Unmold and serve with:

Orange Custard.—Take two large oranges and arrange the sections in a serving dish. Scald a pint of milk in a double boiler and pour over four egg yolks beaten with four tablespoonfuls of sugar, flavor with a half teaspoonful of the grated rind of the orange, add a pinch of salt and cook until the mixture coats the spoon. Cool, add the orange sections and pour around the unmolded jelly when serving.

Orange-Cherry Frozen Salad.—Soak a tablespoonful of gelatin in two tablespoonfuls of cold water and dissolve over hot water. Whip one cupful of heavy cream, add one-fourth cupful of powdered sugar, one tablespoonful of lemon juice and one cupful of mayonnaise. Mix well and fold in one and one-half cupfuls of orange sections and one-half cupful of chopped maraschino cherries. Pour into a mold and pack in layers of ice and salt, or put in the tray of an iceless refrigerator and chill until firm. Serve garnished with crisp hearts of lettuce.

Combination Fruit Salad.—Take one cupful of orange sections, one small can of diced pineapple, one banana cut into small pieces and one cupful of halved strawberries. Mix very carefully with mayonnaise to which three times the bulk is whipped cream and serve in lettuce cups topped by a whole strawberry.

Pear Canapes.—Cut rounds of sponge cake, cover with the sirup from canned pears. Arrange halves of pears cut side down on the cake and sprinkle with almonds or stick them when quartered into the pears. Top with a green or red cherry and serve.

SUMMER DESSERTS

With the fresh fruits and berries so plentiful each in its season, one may have variety with nearly every meal.

Blackberry Pie.—Line a plate with plain crust. Take two and one-half cupfuls of fresh blackberries, sprinkle with three-fourths of a cupful of sugar, a few grains of salt, two tablespoonfuls of flour, and add two tablespoonfuls of currant jelly previously whipped with a fork. Turn into the pastry lined plate, moisten the rim with water and cover with a top crust of rich pastry. Flute the rim and bake thirty-five minutes in a hot oven at first, then reduce the heat and finish baking.

Blackberry Roll.—Prepare a rich biscuit dough and roll out about one-fourth inch in thickness and spread with raspberry jam or fresh berries crushed with sugar. Roll like a jelly roll, moisten the edges of the dough and press the ends securely as possible. Dip a cloth into boiling water, wring in another cloth, dredge with flour and tie up the roll. Allow for room to swell. Cover with boiling water and cook two hours, or steam one hour in a steamer; in either case keep closely covered. Remove from the cloth to a hot serving platter and serve with cream and sugar or a foamy egg sauce.

Lemon Cream Sherbet.—Mix together one and one-third cupfuls of sugar and one cupful of strained lemon juice, then add one pint of milk and a pint of thin cream. Turn into the freezer and freeze. Serve in sherbet glasses; garnish with a sprig of frosted mint. Dip the mint into white of egg and then into granulated sugar, or powdered may be used if preferred.

Hot Peach Cake With Whipped Cream.—Cream one-half cupful of butter, add gradually one and one-half cupfuls of sugar and mix well; add the beaten yolks of two eggs. Sift two cupfuls of flour with two and one-half teaspoonfuls of baking powder and add to the first mixture alternately with one-half cupful of milk. Beat well and spread in a baking pan, cover with peeled sliced peaches. Sprinkle with sugar and nutmeg. Bake twenty-five minutes in a hot oven, serve hot with hard sauce or whipped cream.

There is nothing more delicious than an apple pie made of the green Duchess apples. Wash and slice them unpeeled, use plenty of sugar and bake until the crust is well browned. Add a bit of butter and any flavoring such as nutmeg or cinnamon to the apples as usual.

HISTORY'S MYSTERIES

Unsolved Riddles That Still Puzzle Authorities Here and Abroad

What Became of Father Gapon?

ESPECIALLY in view of the momentous occurrences which have taken place in Russia during the past three decades—events of more widespread importance than he ever dreamed of—the fate of Father Gapon, leader of a mob which was shot down in "Red Sunday," is a matter of interest to a world which has come to regard Russia as the leading riddle of the day.

Father George Gapon was born in a remote village in the Russian province of Poltava, his father being a liberated serf. His birthplace was a miserable hovel, yet Father Gapon was a born leader and finally collected around him such a following as to shake the throne of the Czar himself.

For many years he labored among the peasant classes in his efforts to effect a betterment of their conditions and, in 1904, when there was a great strike among the workmen, Gapon's influence became very manifest. The people loved him, they trusted him and they followed him wherever he commanded, for they recognized in him almost their sole hope for the future.

It was arranged that on the fatal Sunday the working men, with their wives and children, should march to the imperial palace, not in a threatening mood, but as righteous supplicants for justice and that the petition they had framed should be presented to the czar. The procession started in an orderly manner, but the ranks of the marchers were swelled by students, revolutionists and idlers from all sections of the city. Slowly and inexorably they were drawn into a trap prepared for them by the soldiery and, when they had been entirely surrounded, volley after volley was fired into their defenseless ranks, hundreds falling dead in the snow, while the survivors scattered like panic-stricken sheep.

Father Gapon was among those who escaped and, for a time, he was compelled to live in Switzerland and in various other parts of Europe, seeking in every way to help his unfortunate fellow countrymen. Finally, in disguise, he ventured back to St. Petersburg but was eventually discovered and, in April, 1906, only a little more than a year after the attempted intercession with the czar, he entirely disappeared.

What became of him has never become known and many Russians believe that he is still alive. One report was to the effect that he had been secretly hanged on April 10, 1906, by four revolutionists who heard him admit that he was spying on his former revolutionary colleagues on behalf of the police—but no one familiar with the previous life of the priest placed the slightest reliance in this statement, believing that it was given currency by Russian officials who wished to undermine even the memory of the peasant leader. Another report stated that Father Gapon had gone to Valdai, on the lake of the same name, and had entered a monastery there, while the government's statement declared that he had betrayed the cause of the people and was acting in conjunction with the police, giving out no information as to his eventful fate.

In May, 1906, it was believed that the mystery surrounding the disappearance of the priest had been dispelled by the discovery of a corpse, identified as the remains of Father Gapon, hanging in an upper chamber of a lonely villa in Ozerki, Finland. Decomposition of the face made positive identification almost impossible, but the clothing resembled that worn by the missing labor leader.

There was still another story to the effect that the government had spirited the priest away and had confined him in prison, while a counter report declared that Father Gapon had escaped to Constantinople and that a message had been received from him by friends in the United States shortly after the date of his supposed death.

Is the Russian leader alive and safe? If so, why did he not put in an appearance when his country stood in greatest need of him, when the revolutionists overthrew the czar and the red mask of revolution stalked unchallenged from the Volga to the Baltic? Did he turn traitor to the cause which he had championed and finally die at the hands of the men to whom he had devoted his life? Or is he still languishing in a Russian fortress, held prisoner by Soviet chiefs for fear of his influence for good?

No one is able satisfactorily to answer these questions, for the fate of Father Gapon is one of the unsolved riddles of Russia, itself the master mystery of the world.

Take an Easy Chair

She was a maid who had been working for the doctor for years, and the habitual expressions of these years could not be easily laid aside.

When the doctor died she remained at the house. An old friend of the doctor, who had been abroad and had not heard of his death, called and was admitted.

"I would like to see Doctor B," he said.

"I'm sorry," said the maid, "but the doctor is dead."

Stricken by this intelligence, the visitor sat silent for a minute, when the maid said: "Will you wait?"

STENOG CAN'T KEEP WRIST-WATCH RIGHT

The modern "Tweedledum and Tweedledee" of many a Providence office stenog is her wrist-watch and her typewriter.

She cannot get along without either. But the two simply won't get along together.

An employee of a downtown jewelry repair shop says an office typewriter sends more wrist-watches to the shop for repairs and adjustments than any other one thing.

No matter how careful the wearer may be, the rhythmic pounding of the keys of her typewriter submits the watch on her left wrist to a jolting and jarring. The movement quickly results in the delicate hair-spring of the watch becoming twisted. Result: the hands "run wild," gaining or losing in a manner to make the calmest of stenogs bite her finger nails in dismay.

"But it's a 50-50 proposition at that," says the jewelry repair man as he screws his little magnifying glass into his eye and goes on about his work. "The wrist-watch makes the girls late to work. The typewriter keeps them late at work."—Providence Journal.

SEA MAKES INROADS ON HIGHLAND LIGHT

About 10,000 persons annually visit Highland light on the tip end of Cape Cod. According to Keeper Fred Tibbetts, who has had charge of the station for seventeen years, receiving visitors and answering questions are more wearing than the duties Uncle Sam imposes. It was in 1797 that the United States government bought this reservation and began construction of the first Highland light.

The constant battering of the seas against the cliffs at Truro, and erosion of the sand dunes by wind and weather, have taken surprising toll. The original deed showed the conveyance of ten acres of land. Today there remain less than four acres. At the brink of the cliff are wooden benches and seats for visitors. Every other year it becomes necessary to move these back several feet.

It seems but a question of time before the famous lighthouse and its cluster of official buildings must either be moved or go tumbling into the sea. —New York Times.

Allowance for Elbow Room in Stork's Nest

When the storks of the village of Gruenewalde, Germany, fly north from Africa this summer they will find their old home on the schoolhouse, but they will hardly know the place. For the schoolhouse had to be reconditioned during the winter, and the nest had to be taken down. This incidentally gave naturalists a chance to examine a stork's nest of championship proportions, before putting it back on the roof. The nest was more than six feet in diameter and not much less than three feet high, larger by half than an ordinary stork's nest. It could contain four men sitting on chairs around a table. Sticks as thick as an arm had been built into its walls, and the interstices filled with moss, straw, hay and reeds. In odds and ends of space not needed by the storks, upward of fifty sparrow families lived.

Man Cables Shakespeare

A cablegram for William Shakespeare awaits him at the office of Miss A. Justins, the mayor of Stratford-on-Avon, the bard's birthplace. It was sent by a Toronto, Ontario, man, and is addressed "William Shakespeare, care of the Mayor," and states that the sender had seen the film of "The Taming of the Shrew," and that he wished to know how much money Shakespeare wants for the rights of any plays he has written or any he might be writing in future.

Joyful

When Julius Klein came back from Europe he admitted to the press that he hadn't been greatly impressed by the Old world culture.

"Your cathedral chimes and all that sort of thing may be all right," he stated, "but to satisfy me, I want to hear something else. Now, when you get right down to cases, the only sounds that really count are the clang of shovels and the tinkle of cash register bells."

Fashion Devotees Banned

Fashionably clad women are not permitted to cross the Suq Hamidie, largest shopping center of Damascus, during the 30 days' fast of Ramadan, by police orders. The ban runs against short skirts, short sleeves and low necks and is lifted only for wearers of the traditional Moslem black robes.

Sizing Him Up

"Your wife seems to be sizing up your fat friend."

"We're thinking of inviting him to dinner."

"Well?"

"Question is—is there room for him in our nook?"

The Fate of Man

Every now and again we become quite pessimistic, knowing as we do that there is a time in the life of man when he either gets hardening of the arteries of softening of the brain.—Judge.

Horrible Thought

"Just think! I've just discovered I've lost my appetite."

"That's bad. But wouldn't it be worse if some poor man had found it?"

And No Beauty Parlor!

Three hundred white women in a city and no beauty parlor. That is the dismal picture drawn of Accra, the capital city of the Gold coast of Africa, just revealed by one of the 300, who are wives and daughters of the British government officials there. Every woman drives a car and a branch of the Women's Automobile association is to be established in Acca. But when it comes to hairdressing all must wait for ships in order to patronize the ship barbers.

Japan's Floating Prison

By converting an old warship into a prison ship, Japan has taken a modern step toward an ancient custom. This prison ship, however, is different. Only youthful delinquents are accommodated, and they are taught navigation, fishing and other occupations of the sea so that at the end of their prison terms they will be more useful to society and will increase the maritime power of Japan. —Pathfinder Magazine.

Light Visible at 100 Miles

A beacon light of such size and strength that it will be visible for 100 miles is to be erected on the Winnipeg store of the Hudson Bay company as an aid to aerial night travel. The light, 200 feet high, will be the largest airway beacon in Canada. It will have 20 per cent greater intensity than the beacon tower at Croydon, England.

Tree Freak

Howard L. Cox, of Tulare, Calif., has discovered a phenomenon of nature in a locust tree in the Tulare city park. Growing out of the tree is an almond sapling. The shoot apparently was started by an almond being tossed into the crotch of the tree and the seed later taking root. The sapling is about eight feet above the ground.

Electric Shoes

A Hungarian shoemaker has invented a "heatable" shoe. An electric body is concealed between the inner and outer soles of the shoe. The wearer may heat it by attaching a connector in the heel with a wall plug. The heat lasts about one and a half hours.

NATIONAL CONTEST STIRS INTEREST OF WOMEN

Six hundred dollars for a quart jar of canned food! Can one jar of food be worth that?

This is a question that is agitating St. Joe and Spencerville homemakers since word got around that six hundred dollars in cash would be paid for the best jar of fruit, vegetables or meat entered in the second National Canning Contest which is being held at Shenandoah, Iowa, under the auspices of the Household Science Institute.

The contest seeks to further the work of the U. S. Department of Agriculture and the home demonstration agents throughout the country by focusing the attention of American housewives on the economy and healthfulness of home canned foods.

First prize winner in the National Canning Contest last year was Mrs. Mary Hvass, Kennan, Wisconsin, farm woman, whose entry of a quart jar of green peas was chosen as the best entered by the girls and women from all sections of the United States.

The holding of the contest in Iowa this year is due to the influence of Henry Field, Shenandoah farmer, merchant and KFNF anouncer whose career is one of the romances of American life. Imbued with the spirit of trift, he readily agreed to serve as president and to oversee the innumerable details connected with a project of such size and scope.

Offer $4,250 in Prizes

Four hundred and seventy prizcups and ribbons will be distributhe third prize $25, and the fourth ed to the winners in the contest, which comprises three major divisions; fruits, vegetables and meats. The best entry in each division will be awarded $100. One of these will also receive the $500 sweepstakes prize. Second prize in each division will be $50, prize $10. Th winners will also receive a loving cup and ribbon. There will also be 30 prizes of $5 each, 75 prizes of $2.50 each and 300 prizes of $1 each. In addition, $500 in cash will be awarded to to the home demonstration agent whose county sends in the largest number of entries, $250 to the agent whose county sends in the next largest number, and $100 to the agent of the county sending in the third largest number.

The contest is open to every woman and girl in the United States. There are no restrictions as to the nature of the food sent. Contestants may enter one, two or all three divisions. Entries should be sent in as soon as possible after canning. They will be placed and kept on exhibition at Shenandoah until after the closing of the contest, which will be on October 1st.

Contest Closes October 1

Fruit and vegetabes entries in the contest will be judged for clearness, color, pack, neatness, flavor and texture. The meat entries will be judged on neatness, texture and flavor. Judges, each one a recognized food authority, will be Dr. Louise Stanley, director bureau of home economics U. S. Department of Agriculture; Dr. Margaret Justin, president American Home Economics Association; George Farrell, director of extension for the north central states for the Department of Agriculture; Mrs. Josephine Arnquist Bakke, director of home economics for Iowa State Agricultural College; and Miss Elaine Massey, leader of girls club work for Mississippi.

Contestants are free to use any method they prefer, according to Grace Viall Gray, nationally-known canning expert and secretary of the Contest. However, the use of a steam pressure cooker is recommended by the U. S. Department of Agriculture, especially in the canning of meat, since this method not only saves time and fuel and assures absolute sterility, but also preserves the natural flavor and texture, which, of course, are important considerations in contest judging.

That the judging may be thoroughly impartial and the display of jars absolutely uniform, contestants are required to submit their entries in standard glass jars of the quart size. A sample Ball Mason jar and carton together with prize entry labels for use in sending entries may be had without cost by writing the National Canning Contest, Shenandoah, Iowa.

VOL. XLIV — ST. JOE, DeKALB COUNTY, INDIANA, THURSDAY, JULY 31, 1930 — NUMBER 31

VALUATION OF THE SEVERAL TAXING UNITS

The July abstract prepared in the office of County Auditor Estell Dawson showing the local assessment of property in the county as made by the assessors and passed upon by the board of review shows a total of $31,767,450. Last year the figures were $31,446,350. The increase is $321,000.

To this total will be added the corporation assessments made by the state board of tax commissioners. Mr. Dawson estimates the grand total at $42,323,330, an increase of $286,270.

The personal property shown on the abstract this year is $7,595,440, as compared with $7,480,480 a year ago, an increase of $115,000. Some of the taxing units show drastic reductions, but a few of them are substantially increased.

The improvements to farm lands are increased this year $72,000 and the improvements to city and town lots are $118,640 higher.

The total of the various items on the abstract follow:

Acerage, $227,308.62.

Value of lands, $10,653,460.

Value of improvements, $4,769,400.

Total of the latter two items, $15,422,860.

Average value of lands, $46.86 an acre.

Average value of lands and improvements, $67.85.

Number of city and town lots, 9,407.

Value of lots, $2,180,095.

Value of improvements of lots, $6,569,055.

Total of latter two items, $8,749,150.

Polls, 3,831.

Deductions claimed on account of mortgage indebtedness, $1,585,485.

Soldiers' exemptions, $61,440.

Personal property in the cities and towns is assesed as follows: Altona, $18,270; Ashley, $70,770; Corunna, $60,180; St. Joe, $88,570; Waterloo, $205,470; Auburn, $2,635,316; Butler, $462,390; Garrett, $792,470.

Altona shows a loss of $5,000, Ashley $4,000, St. Joe $11,500, Waterloo $26,000 and Butler $18,500.

Auburn was increased $217,000 and Garrett $115,000.

Corunna is practically the same as before.

The personal property in the townships is assessed as follows: Butler, $178,690; Concord, $155,440; Fairfield, $360,750; Franklin, $224,800; Grant, $150,510; Jackson, $333,490; Keyser, $217,870; Newville, $103,740; Richland, $229,540; Smithfield, $300,470; Spencer, $177,030; Stafford, $88,080; Troy, $132,950; Union, $329,844 and Wilmington, $278,800.

The loss in Butler township is $10,000, in Fairfield $59,000, in Franklin $39,000, in Grant $22,000, in Jackson $4,000, in Newville $11,000, in Richland $17,000, in Spencer $25,000, in Stafford $6,000, in Troy $54,000 and in Wilmington $6,000.

Concord is raised $14,000, Keyser $3,800, Smithfield $13,000 and Union $62,000.

BUREAU ISSUES WARNING TO PUBLIC

In a bulletin issued today by Otto G. Fifield, Secretary of State, and head of the Indiana Bureau of Criminal Identification, a warning was issued to all law enforcing officials and citizens generally to be on the lookout for a man who is using the name of J. D. House, who may try to operate in various localities in the State.

The story of the man's operations is that he uses the name of J. D. House as having bought a farm on contract, making a down payment of $1,000.00, by check on the Montgomery National Bank, Mt. Sterling, Kentucky, and also left a $3,000.00 check on the same bank for collection. Information reaching the Bureau of Criminal Identification discloses that this bank has no such account.

The Mt. Sterling bank officials further state that this man used the name of C. F. Hartman in buying a farm in Kentucky, and gave a $1,000.00 check on the First National Bank of Kings Mountain, North Carolina, the check being no good.

This man is described as being about sixty-three years of age, about five feet ten inches tall and weight about one hundred ninety pounds. Most of the left hand missing.

Warning is also issued against a party using the name of John D. O'Brien, who has been cashing numerous checks drawn on the National Malleable Casting Company of Indianapolis, signing the name of Henry S. Morton, treasurer. These checks are fraudulent and Mr. Morton is not treasurer of this company.

O'Brien has decided Irish brogue, about forty to fifty years of age, nice appearance and rather slender.

Mrs. George W. Dorsey offers a $100.00 reward for the return of her son, George W. Dorsey, Jr., age seventeen, height six feet, one inch, weight one hundred fifty eight pounds, light hair, blue eyes, wears a navy suit and has a large tan suit case. He ran away from his home in Prince Frederick, Maryland and it is though that he may have stopped in the state of Indiana.

A woman using the name of Edna Hayes, who is described as being around forty-five years of age, about five feet four inches tall, dark complexion, neatly dressed and presenting a well to do appearance, wearing several large diamonds on her left hand has recently approached bank officers and claims that she has talked with them about two months previous by telephone in regard to an inheritance she was expecting from the estate of her father who was, she claimed, a resident of an Illinois town. She states she has just received news of the death of her grandmother in another state and is urgently in need of money in connection with the funeral expenses. In two instances this woman has succeeded in securing a substantial loan from banks.

Information regarding any of these people should be communicated with the Bureau of Criminal Identification and Investigation, 153 State House, Indianapolis, Indiana. The local officers are asked to hold pending communication.

U. S. POPULATION CALCULATED NOW AROUND 123,000,000

When the census bureau totals up the population of the nation for 1930, a figure somewhat less than 123,000,000 is expected to be the result.

On the basis of preliminary returns from forty states and the District of Columbia, the population has been calculated at 122,957,000.

The enumerators reported for those states a total of 100,807,723 as compared with 86,667,858 ten years ago, an increase of 14,139,845 or 16.31 per cent.

Applying this rate of increase to the country as a whole, the estimated total was reached. Should the final returns bear it out, the figure would represent an increase of 17,246,000 for the last decade.

Reports have still to be received from Pensylvania, New Jersey, Oklahoma, Oregon, Louisiana, Mississippi and Idaho.

CHEESETOWN SCHOOL REUNION

Sunday, July 27, the Cheesetown school house and yard, which has in recent years been purchased by the Cheesetown and Coburntown communities as a social and community center, became the scene of a very pleasant meeting. Nearly a hundred and fifty persons—former students, teachers, and their families—relived, in their minds, the scenes of old.

The most beautiful picnic dinner, on the grounds, was followed by an interesting impromptu program consisting of songs led by C. A. Woodcox, prayer by Rev. J. O. Rose, a literary contest, History of the School by Rev. J. N. Scholes, and a reminiscense by Lee Tustison.

For the literary contest, the entire crowd was divided into four groups according to whether their birthdays came in the Spring, Summer, Fall or Winter. Each group furnished four numbers; namely: a chorus, a reading, a solo, and a number entitled, "Do you remember when?" The contest was close, but winter carried the honors of the day, with Fall, Summer and Spring following in close succession.

At the business meeting it was unanimously decided to make this the first of a series of school reunions to be held annually at the same place on the last Sunday in July.

A collection was taken and the following officers were elected:

President, Abner Trostel.

Vice Pres., Pluma Hamilton.

Sec. and Treas., Mildred Curie.

The plans are to send invitations next year. The name and address of any former student or teacher who was not at this meeting and should be notified may be sent to Mrs. Charles H. Curie, (Sec.) St. Joe, Ind.

Makes Measurement of Processes of Thought

Photographs of thoughts and measurements of cogitations are among the latest marvels of science.

Muscular reaction to a thought wave, it is said, can be expressed in terms of electrical energy. It is now held to be certain that mental processes are functions involving the whole body rather than the brain alone.

Dr. Edmund Jacobson of Chicago university declares, after two years of experiments, that thoughts in a final analysis reduce themselves to nerve-and-muscle reactions, which are measurable.

He does not measure the idea as it exists in the brain; but registers the muscular outgrowth of the thought.

Electrical energy involved in projecting a thought is so slight that it would require at least 2,000,000 persons hooked together and thinking "in phase" to light a sitting room lamp.

Road to Prosperity

All the way from New York comes a new story concerning John D. Rockefeller, the multi-millionaire.

A young man asked his advice as to how best to get on in the world.

"Work hard and set yourself to buy a gold watch," was the reply.

"Yes," queried the listener; "and when you've bought the gold watch?"

"You dont' buy a gold watch," replied Mr. Rockefeller, "you buy a gunmetal one and start all over again for a motor car."

"And when you've got the money for a motor car?"

"Well, you remember the watch, if you're not a fool, and go on walking to business."

LARGE BARN BURNS IN ALLEN COUNTY

The 100 foot barn on the old Benninghoff farm, 2½ miles south of Bair's bridge in Allen county, burned to the ground Saturday evening with considerable loss to John Zimmerman, the present owner.

The origin of the fire is unknown. Considerable new hay and grain was destroyed, besides machinery of all kinds used on the farm.

MOTORISTS AVERAGE THREE HUNDRED MILES PER DAY ACCORDING TO REPORT

Indianapolis, Indiana, July 30, 1930.—Motor tourists today are averaging more than 300 miles per day, as compared with approximately 200 miles per day three years age, according to a statement by the touring bureau of the Hoosier State Automobile Association.

"It is not unusual for some car owners to drive as far as 400 or even 500 miles before "calling it a day," the bureau stated. "Smooth, concrete highways have made these long mileages possible.

"Gravel roads, likewise, have undergone considerable improvement. Most drivers, this year, who have made "straight runs to Los Angeles, for instance, without stopping for sight-seeing, have averaged 300 miles per day, thus making the trip in eight days from Chicago. Only one-third of the distance is paved, the remainder is gravel and some dirt. Three years ago 12 to 14 days were considered necessary for this trip; the average mileage per day at that time ranged from 175 to 200.

MOTOR BOAT CAUSES A NEAR DROWNING

C. M. Brown and wife, of Auburn, had a thrilling experience at Hamilton Lake last Wednesday evening when the back wash from a motor boat upset their boat while quietly fishing near their cottage, and they went down in 30 feet of water.

As they went over the side Mr. Brown caught Mrs. Brown around the waist and they sank in about 30 feet of water. As they came to the top Mr. Brown cautioned his wife not to struggle or get excited and she obeyed his instructions. Mrs. Brown cannot swim. They reached the overturned boat and caught hold of it.

Relatives on the bank that saw the accident were in a state of collapse. Cottage owners ought to join and wage a warfare against these boats on the lake, prohibit their operating at any time. Fisherman are disgruntled over their operations and at the speed with which these boats run, they churn the lake to the bottom, and drive the fish to deep water. Not only should the fisherman's pleasure be the first consideration but the lives of those who are there and using the lake for pleasure, as in the above case.

RURAL SCHOOLS TO BEGIN SEPTEMBER 2

The opening day for the rural schools of the county has been fixed as Tuesday, September 2, the day following Labor Day. There is a possibility of extending the date a week later in case that there should be extreme hot weather at that time. The schools in Waterloo and Auburn will begin on Monday, September 8th.

WHEN
To Start Saving

WHENEVER earning begins, saving should begin.

This is the way to get started in the right direction and when it is started when you are young you keep it up because you realize it's the right thing to do.

Some people never learn to save mainly because they never have given it a thought until they wake up some day and find they made the biggest mistake of their lives. They need money urgently—and they haven't any.

It is never too late to start saving. Begin today and don't stop. OUR BANK is an ideal place to start.

TWO ART CAPITALS

Galleries and Gardens of the Zwinger, Dresden.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

TWO capitals of German states, Dresden in Saxony and Munich in Bavaria, are capitals, as well, of art, and annually draw their thousands of art-loving tourists.

Dresden is filled with artistic wonders. Its picturesque setting, astride a beautiful bend in the Elbe river, about 110 miles south of Berlin, caused Herder, the poet, to call it the Florence of the Elbe.

From an approaching river steamer, the Saxon capital is a city of graceful spires and huge domes and cupolas, but inside the Altstadt (old city) on the left bank of the Elbe, the picture changes to one of artistically embellished buildings, handsomely sculptured monuments, galleries of famous paintings, numerous museums with choice collections of all sorts, spacious squares and parkways, and canyonlike streets where Kunst (German for "art") is heard among the throngs nearly as often as some of the common verbs.

A large portion of the Altstadt lies near the Augustus bridge, one of the five spans that connect the old town with Neustadt, on the other bank of the river. The Hof-Kirche, facing the bridge with its 272-foot tower, is a huge structure, whose parapets are topped with 59 statues of saints and, inside, Raphael Mengs' "Ascension" looks down upon the high altar. A covered passage connects the church with the old Saxon palace, whose walls are decorated with fine mural paintings; and in the various rooms, large collections of Chinese vases and Dresden china are on display. Even the stable adjoining the palace is embellished with a cavalcade of Saxon princes, in porcelain tiles.

Treasures in Many Buildings.

Within a few blocks of the palace numerous buildings contain the collections that have made Dresden famous as the German art center. Between the church and the palace the Grunes Gewolbe (Green Vault) contains a dazzling array of jewels—diamonds, rubies and sapphires—and works of art in gold, ivory, bronze and Limoges enamels. On a single ivory tusk one artist has carved 142 angels and another ivory piece depicts an organ grinder fighting a robber. The Saxon crown jewels, a 40-carat green diamond, jeweled trinkets of all kinds, a golden tea service and the largest known onyx are displayed. Bronze work includes statues, pedestals and vases. A striking bronze piece depicts Charles II of England fighting off a dragon.

Across the street, surrounded by gardens, the Zwinger, built by Augustus the Strong and intended to house banquet and dance halls, promenades and gardens befitting royal life of the Eighteenth century, is a treasury of art. The building is a fine example of Italian Renaissance, adorned with figures of Greek deities, vases and flowers. Once in the court which the Zwinger incloses, the traveler feels that the rose gardens and promenades should fulfill the most regal whim.

The Zwinger museum contains a half million engravings, many drawings, mathematical instruments, and a picture gallery where some of the finest works of the most eminent Italian, Spanish, Dutch and German artists are on exhibition. Raphael's "Sistine Madonna" occupies a prominent place in the collection. It was purchased in 1754 from Italian monks and smuggled out of Italy by painting a landscape over the canvas. There are also works of Rubens, Van Dyck, Rembrandt and others.

The Johanneum museum, formerly stable buildings, contains an interesting collection of war material and more than 20,000 pieces of Chinese, Japanese and Dresden porcelain, and Italian majolica, a glazed pottery.

The Albertinum, once an arsenal, now is a sculpture museum with many historical and modern pieces. Delicately painted limestone reliefs dating back to 2700 B. C. are displayed there, while a mummy still reposes in a coffin it has occupied more than 2,500 years.

Collections and Churches.

These and numerous other exhibit places, including the Municipal museum with a fine collection of etchings; the Academy of Art; the School and Museum of Industrial Art; the Zoological and Ethnographical museum, containing a large collection of stuffed birds and ethnological specimens; the Mineralogical and Prehistoric museum with interesting fossils; draw art lovers from all parts of the world and earn for Dresden the right to be called one of the world's important art centers.

Among the churches the Frauen-Kirche, a Protestant edifice, is the largest. It can accommodate 5,000 worshipers. The church occupies a whole city block. The lantern above its huge dome is 312 feet from the pavement. A magnificent organ and numerous statues are interesting features of its interior.

Between trips to this almost endless array of exhibits, travelers enjoy the Dresden parks and drives. Grosser Garten is nearly half as large as Central Park in New York City. Within its confines are zoological and botanical gardens and the Museum of the Saxon Antiquarian Society, where there are 3,000 objects in porcelain, pewter and carved wood.

In Neustadt, across the river, the Japanese palace, so called from the Japanese porcelain collection it once contained, now houses the Saxon State Library with more than a half million volumes and thousands of manuscripts and maps. Dresden's market place is also in Neustadt, and houses to accommodate many of the city's 620,000 inhabitants.

In point of population Munich (Munchen) is exceeded only by Berlin and Hamburg among German cities. With 680,000 inhabitants it is somewhat larger than San Francisco and smaller than Boston.

Munich Is Magnificent.

In physical aspects Munich is one of the most impressive of modern cities. Its royal palaces, its magnificent national theater, its great royal library containing 1,100,000 volumes and 50,000 rare manuscripts; its broad thoroughfares, particularly the Ludwigstrasse and Maximilianstrasse, bordered by the great office buildings of the Bavarian government, and its famous university which ranks first among the German institutions of learning in the number of its medical students and second only to Berlin in the number of students of all classes—all these and many other buildings and institutions make the municipality one of the chief prides of the Teutonic people.

Most of the modern improvements and practically all of its architectural splendor Munich owes to Louis (or Ludwig) I and his art-loving successors. Louis came to the throne in 1825 and ruled for more than 20 years. One of the impressive monuments of his reign is the beautiful Propylaea, modeled after the gate to the Athenian Acropolis, and the reliefs which decorate this structure quite fittingly tell the story of Greece's war of independence and the events transpiring in that kingdom during the eventful reign of King Otho I, Louis' son who was elected to the throne of Greece in 1832 but was finally expelled after 30 years. Another beautiful Munich gateway is the Siegestor (Gate of Victory), modeled after the Arch of Constantine in Rome.

One Munich gallery exhibits such works as Titian's "Christ Crowned with Thorns," Rembrandt's "The Descent from the Cross" and a Raphael "Madonna," and contains works of Rubens, Van Dyck, Holbein the Elder, Perugino, Botticelli and Fra Filippo Lippi, from which it will be seen that Louis did not hesitate to acquire the masterpieces of other nations.

Louis II saw Bavaria gradually absorbed in the Empire, but, before madness drove him to suicide, he furthered the art development begun by his grandfather. His reign was notable for his encouragement of Wagner's development of the music drama, and to his royal generosity, which would add more to his fame had it not been for the oppressive taxations it imposed and its later excesses, were due the Bayreuth productions.

Its Commerce and Science.

The commercial life of Munich is scarcely less interesting than its artistic side. In America the name of the city was once indelibly associated with its most important article of export, beer. In scientific circles Munich's optical and mathematical instruments have a world-wide reputation; while the art of lithography had its birth there.

The SANDMAN STORY

ABOUT DUCK HAWK

THE Duck Hawk stood upon a great ledge. Below him, far, far, below him, was the flat and even earth, but he could look down without feeling dizzy.

People who climbed great heights might feel dizzy, but not the Duck Hawk, nor any member of his family.

He was standing right on the very edge, too. He knew he would not fall.

He knew even if he felt like going off that ledge that he could simply spread his great wings and fly.

Then, too, his feet were so splendid and strong. He had great, enormous feet. And he was very proud of them. He didn't try to squeeze his feet or cover them up or hide them. Outspread were his feet, and so proud of them was he that he liked the name often given to the family beside that of Duck Hawk.

Many called him the Great-Footed Hawk, and he was pleased with that name.

He felt that it made him seem so powerful. People might wear shoes and so try to make their feet look smaller than they were.

Or maybe they weren't foolish enough to pinch their feet, but perhaps they didn't show them off.

He wouldn't have worn shoes on his great feet. Not he. Nor would any bird or creature of the out-of-doors. He had heard of children who went barefooted in the summer time, and he thought they were showing a great deal of sense.

He had heard of children, too, who were proud when they did not take small sizes of shoes.

Oh, how proud he was of his feet. He stood now upon a great ledge looking very handsome. He was an enormous fellow.

On either side of his mouth or throat was a black patch which he called his mustache. It did look as though he wore a mustache.

His waistcoat was of white with shadings of buff and speckled with smart stylish black touches. His coat was of slate blue.

It was a gorgeous coat, and his cap matched his coat, but was of a slightly darker shade.

It was not so very long since he had been a young fellow with a suitable suit of brown and tan and black. It was not well for a young fellow to dress too magnificently. That was for an older bird.

And before that he had been an egg of buff color decorated with brown. He had been told about that. He had not remembered anything before the time he was hatched out of his shell, and he had remembered that hardly at all.

He had always liked ledges, though. It came to him naturally, as even before he had been hatched forth he had been put upon a ledge without any nest to speak of at all.

His family was not one for soft, easy nests. His family like a rugged, hard, wild, free life without cares and without responsibilities.

He had always been fearless and had always been brave.

And he liked to fly over great stretches of splendid country. "I'm fond of the North and the West," he said. "It's so much more free and big and open, to my way of thinking. And I love the great rocks I find and the great cliffs."

He had been standing still long enough. Now he must go forth and seek his prey.

No one would get the better of him! He would get the better of anyone. They would be afraid of him!

He would sail forth into the splendid air, and how quickly he would fly.

No one could fly more quickly than he could fly. Certainly not the ducks he would go after.

Not the most rapid flyer among them could get ahead of him.

He was Duck Hawk, the great, wild, splendid bird.

Anyone who knows him knows that this is so.

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

EYEWINKERS AND THE FERRULE

AN OLD New England belief among schoolboys, and one which is found in all the rural districts today where the population is of the stock of the original settlers, is that an "eyewinker"—that is, an eyelash—placed in the palm of the hand will cause the ferrule to break when the teacher strikes the palm in a disciplinary mood. The "eyewinker," as the children call it, plays a part in many current superstitions and derives its magic power in many cases—probably in most cases—from the fact that it is a part of the paraphernalia of the eye.

The magic of the eye is a primitive conception which has already been dealt with in this series notably in connection with that ancient, world-wide and still potent superstition of the Evil Eye. One who has visited southern Europe or the Levant need not be told how deeply ingrained is the evil-eye superstition among the peoples of those regions from the highest to the lowest. Nor is it entirely unknown among northern nations and some of our own popular superstitions are clearly adaptations of it.

The New England schoolboy's eyewinker superstition may be considered as a derivative from the superstition of the evil eye, in its most primitive form; that is to say the conception of the power of the eye. The eyewinker partakes of this power from the fact that it is an adjunct of the eye partaking of the eye's qualities by the magic of contact and association. The eyewinker, thus charged with magical power, exerts such power when brought into contact with the hostile ferrule. Some boys assert that even if the ferrule is not shattered the presence of an eyewinker in the palm of the assailed hand is sure to "make the smart less."

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

"ALL MY EYE"

"OH, THAT'S all my eye," we are apt to say apropos of something that we consider nonsensical or trifling.

And rich indeed is the story behind this colloquialism.

It has been suggested that the expression may have something to do with the idea of having something in one's eye (or mind), figuratively speaking, and that it will never materialize.

This thought is only a secondary surmise. The fact is that this peculiar turn of language is a corruption of an Italian phrase, "ah, mihi, beate Martine," meaning "Woe to me, Blessed Martin"—the pet invocation of Italian beggars to their saint.

The expression was introduced into our language, so it is said, by an English sailor who, upon coming out of an Italian church and upon being asked what he saw going out, replied with a twinkle in his eye:

"All my eye and Betty Martin!"

RECREATION

THE summer season suggests the idea of recreation. It is the vacation time, when a few weeks, free from business, are enjoyed both by employees and employers. Where this vacation is spent depends largely upon two things: personal inclinations and the size of one's pocketbook. What would be a vacation to one person would be hard toil to another. A two weeks' season of golf would be neither enjoyable nor profitable to a person uninterested in that particular game. Some people like to travel, others dislike it. A vacation period is intended to be a time of relaxation and any experiences which defeat that end do not fulfill the purpose of a real vacation.

L. A. Barrett.

It is interesting to note the different ways people spend their vacations. President Coolidge spent most of his vacation fishing on some secluded estate away from the crowd and heat of the Capitol. The president of one of the largest banks in our country spends his vacation on his farm, "just watching things grow." Many go in for traveling in this country and touring Europe.

Vacations vary in their length of time. Those engaged in teaching in the public schools and in colleges usually have the entire summer free so that they may do as they please. Many teachers devote this time to advance study in their chosen field. Employees in offices usually are given two weeks' time, those in factories one week.

The benefit derived from a vacation does not depend so much on the time element as to how that time is spent. Some persons return from a vacation more tired than when they went away. Some persons react more quickly than others. A few days spent away from executive and financial responsibilities will do a great deal of good if one knows how to relax. There is no benefit in going on a vacation if we take our worries with us.

A few suggestions for a successful vacation would be: Spend the time in an environment which offers a complete change from one's daily toil. Leave all troubles and worries at home. Get as much fresh air, good food, and rest as possible. "Saturate yourself with sleep." It is the play time of the year. Play as much as you can. If you return refreshed and ready for work you have had a successful vacation.

Dear Editor:

IT PROBABLY is more blessed to give than to receive, but giving requires more system.

My experience, hewn out of a lifetime of thoughtful study, is that wives love a frequent if judicious giver. A half pound of candy twice a month is better than a five pound box on a birthday.

One winter I bought some carnations for an anniversary, and then in a burst of originality, added a dozen pussywillows. I never saw such a thrifty gift. The pussies stayed fresh all winter.

But I never dared repeat, while one such bouquet might seem humorous, a second would seem stingy. And then of course one must always be original, even refusing to borrow past ideas from one's own self.—Fred Barton.

A Sour Stomach

In the same time it takes a dose of soda to bring a little temporary relief of gas and sour stomach, Phillips Milk of Magnesia has acidity completely checked, and the digestive organs all tranquilized. Once you have tried this form of relief you will cease to worry about your diet and experience a new freedom in eating.

This pleasant preparation is just as good for children, too. Use it whenever coated tongue or fetid breath signals need of a sweetener. Physicians will tell you that every spoonful of Phillips Milk of Magnesia neutralizes many times its volume in acid. Get the genuine, the name Phillips is important. Imitations do not act the same!

HISTORY'S MYSTERIES

Unsolved Riddles That Still Puzzle Authorities Here and Abroad

Who Killed James Maybrick?

BOTH on account of the fact that she was the daughter of a banker in Mobile, Ala., and because the death of her husband was surrounded by the most mysterious circumstances, the trial and subsequent imprisonment of Mrs. Mary Chandler Maybrick for the murder of her English husband caused a widespread sensation on both sides of the Atlantic and threatened for a while to lead to a diplomatic break between London and Washington. Mrs. Maybrick's final release in 1905 was heralded as a final confession of error on the part of British law and a vindication of the woman who had been wrongfully imprisoned for fifteen long years. But even this did not clear up the mystery connected with the death of James Maybrick.

Mary Elizabeth Chandler, who was destined to play a leading role in this tragedy of legal mistakes, married James Maybrick of Liverpool when she was eighteen years of age. During the second year of their marriage a son was born to them and, later, a daughter.

For eight years the married life of the Maybricks appeared to be as happy and pleasant as possible. Then, apparently without any explanation whatever, Maybrick developed the temper of a brute, finally beating his wife and turning her out into the street. Evidence produced at the trial, however, showed that Maybrick had become a confirmed arsenic-eater and this was understood to account for his sudden alteration in habits and disposition.

Following the brutality of her husband, Mrs. Maybrick sued for a divorce but, on account of the children, the couple were reconciled and lived together quietly for a short time. In the spring of 1889, however, Maybrick was taken ill and died a short time later, presumably from natural causes. The dead man's family, however, maintained that there had been foul play and insisted upon having the body exhumed, particularly as they announced that they had discovered no less than seventy grains of arsenic concealed in the room which Mrs. Maybrick had shared with her husband.

In spite of the fact that minute examination of the body disclosed the presence of only one-tenth of a grain of arsenic and medical authorities stated that two grains was the smallest dose which could possibly prove fatal, Mrs. Maybrick was arrested on the charge of murder and the ensuing trial was one of the most sensational in the annals of the British courts. The attorney for the defense proved conclusively that Maybrick had been in the habit of eating enough arsenic to kill a dozen men and showed that he had continually bought large quantities of this poison for his personal use. The prosecution countered with the statement that this alleged habit of the dead man was a fabrication invented for the sole purpose of explaining the arsenic found in the house after Maybrick's death and exploded a bomb-shell in the shape of evidence that Mrs. Maybrick had purchased flypaper containing arsenic which she had soaked out, stating that she intended to use this as a complexion bleach.

But, as the concluding statement of the counsel for the defense showed, Mrs. Maybrick had been the first to give the alarm when her husband had been taken ill and, as her lawyer put it, "if she had wished to set every one in the house and the doctors themselves on the scent of poison, she could not have acted differently."

Sir Fitzjames Stephen, presiding judge, delivered a long and rather rambling address to the jury which appeared, at first, to favor the defendant but which concluded with what was practically a demand for her conviction and the jury, after being out only thirty-eight minutes, returned with a verdict of "guilty as charged." Shortly afterwards the judge went mad and the Liverpool Post in commenting upon the matter said: "In fancy, one still hears the distant fanfare of the trumpets as the judges with quaint pageantry pass down the hall, and still the mind's eye sees the crimson-clad figure of the great mad judge as he sat down to try his last case. A tragedy, indeed, was played upon the bench no less than in the dock."

Having been sentenced to the gallows, Mrs. Maybrick remained in prison for seven weeks and then, after having been warned that her execution would take place within a few days, was suddenly reprieved and her sentence commuted to life imprisonment. During the years that followed an almost constant stream of diplomatic messages about the American woman passed between London and Washington, but it was not until fifteen years after she had entered prison that Mrs. Maybrick was released on a "ticket to leave"—with the mystery of what had really caused the death of her husband still unsolved.

MOST TORNADOES NOT DANGEROUS

Motorist Should Drive Car North or South.

In spite of their ferocity, tornadoes offer little peril to motor tourists if four general rules are kept in mind and obeyed when a twister is sighted, points out the touring bureau of the Chicago Motor club.

"Inasmuch as nearly all tornadoes move in generally easterly direction, the car should be driven north or south, out of its path," the bureau stated in a bulletin. "One should be careful, however, not to drive into a second one.

Get Into Cyclone Cellar.

"If the car is disabled, get into a cyclone cellar, if one is near. Failing in both of those plans, take refuge in the cellar of a frame house, on the side nearest the storm. Should the house topple, the debris will be blown away from you. If there is no other recourse than to face the storm in the open, lie flat on the ground, or preferably in a ditch some distance from trees or poles. Shield your head with seat cushions."

Tornadoes are, the bureau explained, traveling whirlwinds. Their destructive area at any one moment is not greater, on the average, than two or three square city blocks. While the rate of whirl at its axis may be three or four hundred miles per hour, it seldom travels across the country faster than sixty miles per hour.

Tornadoes Move Northeast.

Most tornadoes move toward the northeast, while a few travel toward the southeast. The chances are about fifty to one that the direction in which it is seen to be moving is the one which, with but slight variations, it will pursue until it dies out.

Controlled Lights Are Favored for All Storms

Controlled lighting offers the most satisfactory solution of the difficulties of driving through fog or snow and rainstorms.

Fog generally hangs just above the ground and lighting equipment which can be adjusted to get underneath the fog for a short distance ahead of the car so that the driver may see the edge of the road is the most desirable. A road light, attached below the front bumper, is effective. Dimming equipment which tilts the beams of the headlights downward have an advantage over some other types of dimmers.

Controllable spotlights or searchlights which can be trained on the edge of the roadway are desirable equipment for driving under these conditions. Fog continues to be hazardous and calls for unusual caution on the part of the motorist, just as it continues to trouble the airplane pilot and the sailor.

In the same way controllable lighting equipment is best for driving in heavy snow and rain, from the standpoint of path illumination.

In inclement weather accidents are fewer in proportion to the hazards involved than they are on bright, clear, and dry nights, because drivers naturally use extreme caution.

Small Gas Engine Most Versatile Farm Worker

Some one has said that the small gas engine will do practically anything a hired man can do except take the hired girl to town on Saturday night. In fact, a gas engine is one of the most versatile choreboys on the farm.

At least 20 or 25 farm jobs can be done with gas engine power, for only a few cents per hour of work. A gas engine will eliminate the drudgery of operating a washing machine by hand. It will pump the water, drive the water system or operate the farm light plant. Other common jobs are grinding feed, sawing wood, operating the grain elevator, running the grindstone, mixing concrete and many more.

THE MOTOR QUIZ

How Many Can You Answer?

Q. How often is the oil circulated through the engine's oiling system at average driving speed?

Ans. From 100 to 150 times an hour.

Q. How is spark plug preignition revealed?

Ans. The engine loses power and the driver often thinks he is running out of gas; a pinging noise is sometimes heard; missing at continuous high speed.

Q. What factors are necessary for perfect carburetor performance?

Ans. Proper carburetor adjustment, good compression and ignition.

Repairing Poor Idling of Motor Car Engine

The effective opening past the butterfly valve, to allow the motor to idle at a slow speed, is surprisingly small. After the car has been in use for several years, the shaft on which the butterfly is mounted and its bearings become worn. The result is that the butterfly never closes to the same position twice running; in addition, a considerable amount of air leaks through around the shaft bearings. A simple way to cure this trouble is to remove the adjusting screw entirely so that the butterfly closes tight. File a small notch in the edge of the butterfly valve as shown. The notch should be filed in the side of the butterfly valve on which the low speed nozzle is located and the size of the notch will govern the idling speed.—Popular Science Monthly.

With adjusting screw removed, file a notch in the butterfly valve to govern the idling speed of the motor, when the bearings admit air.

Bobs Was a Good Beggar

By CLARISSA MACKIE

(Copyright.)

OUTSIDE the hardware store on Gay street was a low stand piled with kitchenware. A few mischievous boys played around, trying to make friends with a huge mastiff which sat patiently on the sidewalk, waiting for some one within the store.

"You don't dare!" challenged one boy to another.

Jimmy Smith elevated a freckled nose, and manuevered his way to the display stand. In a moment he had a shining tin pail and was offering the handle to Bobs, the dog. That was how it happened that people smiled as they saw the big dog sitting patiently, holding the pail in his mouth. Around the corner peered four freckled faces, eyes ashine with delight.

An old lady walking slowly along dropped a dime in the pail, and went on. Bobs moved an appreciative tail. A young man absorbed in his newspaper saw the outline of the supplicant's figure, dropped another dime in the pail, and to this day believes that he contributed to the welfare of a hunchbacked blind man.

Then, at last, came Jerry Lamson. He was late in getting to his office and had not a moment to spare, but when he saw the shining pail and the great golden eyes of Bobs, he paused long enough to pat Bobs on his splendid head and flick a dollar bill into the pail.

This was too much for the watching boys and they made a dash for the pail. Jerry, suspicious, watched them and smiled. Bobs growled deep in his chest and showed his fangs. He had something to guard.

"It's darned queer," thought Jerry Lamson, and hurried as he went back to the hardware store and entered. The proprietor was in the distant background talking to a customer.

"Is that your dog out there?" asked Jerry. "The one holding a pail for pennies."

"A pail for pennies?" asked a new voice, and the customer turned around. Jerry watched as she came down the store, walking with the free stride of an outdoors girl; her fair hair shone under a bright little felt hat, her face was charming, her clothes expensively simple. From one gloved hand dangled a leash. "I left my dog outside," she said, going to the door.

"Poor old boy," murmured the girl. "Some one played a cruel joke on us, didn't they? I'll take the pail, Bobs, and we will give the money to the blind man on the next block." She emptied the money into her hand, and replaced the pail.

Jerry bared his head. "There isn't anything amusing about it," he said a little stiffly. He smiled down at Bobs, and Bobs thrust a friendly muzzle into his hand.

Jerry replaced his hat and went on. Jean Manners watched him out of sight. "Isn't he splendid?" she thought, and blushed in the thinking. "Bobs liked him, and his judgment of men is infallible."

Not long afterwards Jean and Jerry met in a conventional manner at an evening party, and mutual attraction led to a rapid wooing on the part of Jerry, a very successful lawyer, and within four months the engagement was announced. By this time Bobs and Jerry were devoted friends.

Then, when a lovers' quarrel came, and stayed, black and menacing so that the two strong natures clashed, and parted, then Bobs was lonesome and depressed.

The young couple were aching to make up again, but the same lofty pride dominated each of them. They both resolved to forget.

Bobs didn't forget, and one morning he ran away from home. Straight down the shady street, turning into Center street, down Center to Main, trotting along, sure of his destination. When he reached the hardware store he paused and looked up at Mr. Peet, standing in the doorway.

"Hallo, Bobs," he said.

Bobs barked a response and looked at the display table and wagged his tail. Mr. Peet laughed. "Want something to carry, eh?" he asked. Reaching back he picked up a little broken basket and offered it to the open mouth. Clamp went the big jaws, and there was Bobs, the mendicant, once more.

Mr. Peet dropped a bright penny in the basket, and Bobs dashed off down the street, the little basket dangling from his mouth. Two blocks down, and up a familiar staircase to the first floor. The door was opened and the office boy laughed when Bobs cleared the railing and went straight toward Jerry Lamson's door marked "Private." Nothing was private to Bobs when he was after one he adored. He pushed open the door and walked in, sitting down beside Jerry's chair, and looking up with such appeal in his eyes that Jerry dropped his own sad face down on the massive head. "Why did you come alone, Bobs?" he asked.

There was the smell of fresh violets, and there was Jean, a little breathless, wistful.

"Forgive me, dearest," they said in unison and Bobs beamed his approval.

Use for Historic Building

The old court house in St. Louis, in which the Dred Scott case was tried, will be used as an exhibition place for the art of the Mississippi valley, according to plans now being shaped by the St. Louis Art league. The historic building, whose dome once was the giant of the city, now nestled down among clusters of skyscrapers, will be abandoned by the civil courts when the new $4,000,000 civil court house is ready for occupancy. The exhibitions, according to present plans, would be devoted mainly to works of modern art and are all associated with the Midwest and the valley.

HEAD LINE ATTRACTIONS AT WINONA LAKE

Winona Lake, Indiana, July 30. —One of the outstanding features of the Winona Lake Movie program, will be presented next Tuesday night in the Tabernacle. The film, which consists of eight reels, will be the actual photographs of Rear Admiral Byrd and his company of explorers, filmed at the bottom of the earth on his polar expedition. It is a story picture of a daring feat. The picture shows Byrd leaving New York, scenes on shipboard, a storm at sea, and a battle with the Antarctic ice pack. Winona Lake presents pictures every Tuesday night, and this picture is the most outstanding of all pictures coming for the entertainment of the Winona geusts. Byrd just recently returned from the south pole, with his company, where he has been exploring for two years.

Another outstanding feature of this week's program will be the annual appearance, in the "Billy" Sunday Tabernacle, on Friday evening, August 1st, of Rev. "Billy" Sunday. Rev. Sunday gives at least one address here each summer, and on every previous occasion, has attracted the banner crowd of the Chautauqua season. His home is at Winona Lake.

Dedication of a new chapel, given to the Presbyterian synod of Indiana by Mrs. Bertha B. Haynes and Mrs. Bernice Haynes Hillis, in memory of their husband and father, Elwood Haynes, maker of the first automobile, will be dedicated at Winona Lake on Sunday, August 3rd. Th dedication service is scheduled for 3 o'clock, Central Standard Time.

The chapel will be used in connection with Camp Kosciusko, which is conducted by the Committee of Christian Education of the Synod of Indiana, under personal direction of Robert J. McLandress, of Indianapolis. This camp this year will entertain six groups of Presbyterian Young People, each group consisting of about 200 boys or girls. The young people are housed at Kosciusko Lodge, a 200 room hotel donated to the Presbyterian Church several years ago by Mrs. "Billy" Sunday. The new chapel was erected this year. Rev. Rhys Price Jones, D. D., of South Bend, moderator of the Synod of Indiana, will deliver the dedication sermon. The dedicatory service will be in charge of the Rev. Harry L. Crain, D. D., pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Frankfort and Chairman of the Committee of Religious Education of the Synod. Mrs. March Haynes, well known singer, will sing at the exercises.

Presbyterians from all parts of the state are expected to attend the exercises and inspect the church's splendid camp.

"The Freedom of Liberty Bell," a historical pageant with a fascinating romance running through most of its settings, will be presented in the tabernacle at Winona Lake on the evening of August 9, as a regular feature of the Chautauqua program. The pageant will be staged by the National Reform Association as the climax of its annual program here. More than 100 persons will appear in the cast, including some who played leading roles when the same pageant was given successfully at Philadelphia recently.

Historically, the pageant covers all the important periods in the history of America and carries a great patriotic message to the people of today. The first two episodes present scenes from the early Colonial periods; the third episode deals with the Civil War, and the final episodes picture America since the Civil War. Outstanding features will be a Colonial tea party, Betsy Ross presenting the first flag, ringing Liberty Bell on Independence Day, and a tragic event in the public life of Lincoln. Some notable historic characters depicted in the pageant are George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, Betsy Ross, Francis E. Willard, and Mrs. Bache, daughter of Benjamin Franklin.

HISTORY'S MYSTERIES

Unsolved Riddles That Still Puzzle Authorities Here and Abroad

The Lost Ambassador

WHEN, in the early part of the last century, it became necessary to transmit certain papers of great diplomatic importance from the Court of St. James' to that of the Emperor Francis of Austria—documents which urged Austria to declare war against Napoleon—the man chosen for this delicate mission was a young diplomat named Benjamin Bathurst, son of Lord Bishop Bathurst of Norwich.

Young Bathurst had been in the service of the foreign office for several years and had always showed himself to be as dependable as he was fearless and his journey to Vienna was made practically without incident. While he was still at the Austrian capital there occurred the famous battle of Wagram, followed by an armistice and peace highly favorable to the Napoleonic forces. Bathurst, however, was informed in no mild terms that he had incurred the displeasure of the French emperor by reason of his exploit in reaching the Austrian court in time to swing the tide which brought that nation into the conflict and, when he started on his return trip to London, he purposely took an indirect route leading through Trieste and Malta in order to escape the vengeance of Bonaparte. In addition, he traveled under the incognito of "Herr Koch, a traveling merchant," and his attendants as well as himself were heavily armed.

Nothing occurred until Bathurst arrived at Perlburg, on the road to Hamburg, where the party stopped at noon. His secretary and his valet reported later that the young diplomat had been absolutely fearless during the journey and did not appear to be in the least troubled by the dangers through which he had passed unscathed. As Bathurst sat at dinner in the Inn of the White Swan, however, the maid who was serving him saw him glance up suddenly and, as she later phrased it, "Turn white as a ghost and shake as if he had been stricken with the palsy." Wheeling around, she caught a fleeting glimpse of a man's back, moving rapidly away from the window—but that was all. Immediate search of the premises was made, without result. No suspicious characters had been seen and no strangers had been reported, save the usual noon-day arrivals at the inn.

After finishing his dinner, Bathurst informed his secretary that he would alter his plans and remain at the inn overnight, pressing on toward Hamburg in the morning. Then he went to the commandant of the army post nearby and, stating that he had reason to believe that his life was in danger, requested an armed guard around the inn at night. Soldiers were accordingly detailed as an additional protection and a cordon of them was thrown about the inn at sunset.

About two hours later Bathurst stepped outside the door of the inn—but not outside the circles of armed guards—to make certain that his horses were ready to continue their journey on the following day. According to the accounts of those present at the time, the Englishman could not have gone more than five steps without being visible to some of the soldiery. But, despite all the precautions, he disappeared as completely as if the earth had opened and swallowed him!

Some fifteen minutes later, alarmed by his master's failure to return, Bathurst's valet started in search of him, only to find that the young diplomat had never even reached the stables behind the inn, nor did the most thorough search of the surrounding country bring any clue to light until, nearly a month later, two peasants in search of firewood came across a pair of trousers such as Bathurst had worn, concealed in the forest some two miles distant. The trousers were stained with blood and, in one of the pockets, was a half-written letter to Mrs. Bathurst, informing her that a certain Count d'Entraigues, a French spy, had been seen nearby and that Bathurst himself feared that he might never return to England alive.

Was d'Entraigues the man whom Bathurst had seen through the window of the inn? The supposition appears to be likely, but, even granting that it were, how did the Frenchman succeed in capturing Bathurst under the very eyes of his own men and the armed guards? Also, what disposition was made of the Englishman's body, for the river was dragged and the country searched for miles around without locating another clue. However, in tearing down a house near the inn nearly forty years later, the skeleton of a man was found buried under the floor, but this was never identified, and the disappearance of Benjamin Bathurst remains one of the mysteries of the Napoleonic wars —particularly since the Count d'Entraigues was murdered a short time after Bathurst vanished.

On display in News office window is a freakish piece of wood resembling a head of a sheep. The root was found by Chas. Reasoner and was dressed up and mounted by Bert Jackson local taxidermist. The ears are perfect, and the animal has but two legs. It is in its natural form, and by this we mean it was not carved out of wood.

Alleging that due to negligence of the defendant, he and his wife were injured to the extent of $6,000, C. B. Yonts of Wisconsin, Thursday filed a suit for that amount in the United States court at Fort Wayne. Jesse B. Garnes of Auburn, is the defendant in the suit. Mr. Yonts alleges Mr. Garnes' careless driving caused the accident July 9, 1929, on United States Road No. 20, and states that his wife, Mary Ellen, is permanently disabled as a result of the accident.

Last Thursday evening twenty-three friends of Leoral Hart very pleasantly reminded him of his twentieth birthday in the form of a surprise party. The evening was spent in playing numerous games. At a late hour refreshments were served to the guests. Those in attendance were LaNore Laub, Irene Pierman, Julia and Dorothy Varner, Beatrice and Mary Ayers, Margaret Hamilton, Annabelle Hart, Flossie and Mabel Inlow, Dwight Koch, Fredrick Laub, Dale Trostel, Raymond Brown, Kenneth Coburn, Eugene Newton, Harold Mathews, Leslie Inlow, Henry, Jesse, and James Hart, and Mr. and Mrs. Laney Gee.

TREE LONG BURIED BY LAVA REVEALED

A tree with a trunk seven feet in diameter, buried by a lava flow centuries ago and preserved in the rock, crashed through the roof of the canal tunnel near the Yakima river at Ellensburg, Wash., a short time ago.

The section of tree which fell was 25 feet in length, the outer part partially petrified, but the core still in much the same condition as when some volcano eruption buried it ages before Columbus thought of his western voyage.

Several buried logs have been found 225 feet below the present surface, but this was the first upright tree uncovered and is regarded as evidence that a dense forest existed there in prehistoric times.

The roots of the old tree were in a shale formation that was once rich, fertile loam, but which under pressure of the lava bed became rock. Evidently the hot lava came quickly and covered the forest at once, for the huge tree did not catch fire, nor was it charred. Lava covered the earth at this point 250 feet deep.

In various places along the tunnel site drills have struck wood, some of the cores showing that old logs lie from 125 feet to 225 feet deep.

All notary work can be promptly cared for at News office. Call and see us.

A Dark Floor Gives the Room the Right Kind of Foundation.

My dear Beth:

Yes, I can preach you a little sermon on floors and what to do with them. But you must remember that, as with all sermons, the person "prenched at" is supposed to make the application. You are too independent to just take over without thought anything I say, I am sure.

If you decide to carpet your floors you have several choices. I'll tell you about them in a minute, but before I do, like the preacher, I must read the text to you. It is this: floors are the foundation of the room and should be the darkest plain surface. I don't mean that it has to be black, or always very dark, but it is supposed to be darker than any other part of the rooms—darker than walls or ceiling.

Another thing about rugs and carpets that you should remember is that if you have figured draperies and figured upholstery material or figured wall paper you had better have plain rugs. Too many patterns spoil the appearance of a room. It is restful and more pleasing to have one plain surface, either rugs, draperies, walls or upholstery material.

Carpeting the entire floor is the simplest way of finishing it. Then there is no floor staining and polishing to bother about. A room carpeted all over is certainly rich and luxurious looking. You know how nice it is to walk on. If the room is very large the all-over carpet helps to pull it together and creates that cozy appearance everyone likes to see in a living room.

If the room is large, and if the walls and draperies permit, a carpet of fairly large and somewhat pronounced pattern may be used. Of course I do not need to warn you against the bright red cabbage roses—that is not what I mean by a large and pronounced pattern. There are a great many attractive patterns in beautiful colors to select from. The gorgeous, splashing reds and yellows went out with Queen Victoria and we hope they are gone forever.

A small pattern is the only one for a small room. This will have the effect of making the room seem larger, while a large pattern would make it seem small.

A plain, neutral tone carpet is always safe and sure to be satisfactory. If you want more color on the floor you can place small rugs on top the carpet, but don't scatter them—put them exactly where you want them. These are just some suggestions about floors, I'll give you more at another time.

Fondly, Fern Eture.

Here's Additional Proof That Silence Is Golden

Elihu Root said in an after-dinner speech in New York on his return from Geneva:

"Silence is golden in diplomacy. It is golden everywhere.

"Once upon a time a corpse in a bathing suit was fished out of the sea and sent to an undertaker's. A rich young man called the next day and identified the corpse as his father. The young man was giving orders to the undertaker for the most expensive burial in the establishment's program when the mouth of the corpse fell open, and a row of false teeth dropped out.

"'That's not father,' said the young man, and he hurried away.

"The undertaker had been putting the corpse into a mahogany coffin with gold trimmings, but now he put it back on its stone slab again.

"'Idiot!' he said to it. 'If you'd kept your mouth shut you'd have had an A-1 funeral.'"

Defies Intense Heat

One of the constantly occurring problems of industry is the demand for crucible which will stand the intense heat temperature required in some branches of metallurgy. The experiment station of the bureau of mines has been giving this matter some attention. As a result crucible for holding molten mixtures of iron sulphates and oxides for 45 minutes at a temperature of 1,500 degrees centigrade without appreciable seepage have recently been developed.

Auto Tires in Color

The craze for color has taken the form of a demand for automobile tires to match the car. In Great Britain and on the continent automobile manufacturers are offering vehicles on which the tires match the body of the car perfectly. The claim is made that the tires thus treated with the special material designed for the purpose are preserved and therefore last much longer, but the principal object is the harmonious color effect.

Synthetic Bee Stings Out

Perfection of synthetic bee stings has been announced by the medical laboratory of Vienna, Austria. Professors of the Polyclinic hospital made chemical analysis bee venom and claim to have succeeded in duplicating and improving it. The stinging chemical is said to cure rheumatism.

NAOMI AND RUTH: A STUDY IN RACIAL RELATIONSHIPS

LESSON TEXT—The Book of Ruth.
GOLDEN TEXT—And hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth.
PRIMARY TOPIC—Ruth a Helpful Daughter.
JUNIOR TOPIC—Naomi's Faithfulness Leads Ruth to God.
INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Our Neighbors of Other Races.
YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Way to World Brotherhood.

I. How Naomi and Ruth Were Brought Together (1:1-15).

On account of famine in Bethlehem of Judah, Naomi with her husband and two sons sojourned in the land of Moab. After the death of her husband, her two sons married Moabitish women. After a time her sons died also. After the death of her sons, Naomi resolved to return to her homeland, having heard that the Lord had visited his people in giving them bread. They went to Moab to escape trouble but only got into more. This is always the case when God's people go into the world to escape difficulties. It was not until Naomi was thus chastised that she resolved to return. When the time came for her to go, Ruth and Orpah accompanied her for a distance.

II. Ruth's Noble Choice (1:16-18).

Greatly as Naomi loved her daughters-in-law, she would not have them go into this matter blindly. She wished them to know the seriousness of their action.

1. No chance for them to marry again (v. 11).

Naomi told them that she had no more sons for whom they could wait. In that day for a woman to be unmarried was the greatest disgrace. Society differed then from now. No avenues were open by which women could earn their living.

2. Heathen gods must be renounced (v. 15).

Idolatrous worship could not be carried on in the land where God's people dwelt. This was delicately touched upon when Orpah went back. She went back when it was plain that there was no chance for her to get a husband. After Orpah's return Naomi put an additional test upon Ruth, that of giving up her religion. Ruth was equal to the occasion. Her mind was fully made up. She was willing to accept as her God the One who was able to produce in his subjects the nobility of character she had observed in Naomi. Ruth's determination was so definite and unfaltering that her expressions have come down to us in words which "no poetry has outrivaled and no pathos has exceeded, and which has gone through centuries with the music which will not let them be forgotten." She was determined to share Naomi's journey, her home, her lot in life, and grave in death, whatever or wherever that would be. To crown it all, she renounced her heathen gods and worshiped Jehovah, the true God.

III. Blessings Which Attended Ruth's Choice.

1. She found the true God (1:16).

Instead of a heathen god who was unable to help her, she had the Living God, the God of Israel.

2. She found friends (ch. 2).

As she went to glean she was led to the field of Boaz, a man of grace and wealth. The servants of Boaz treated her with consideration.

3. A good husband and happy home (chs. 3 and 4).

4. An honored place in the Israelitish nation (4:13-17).

5. She became a link in the chain of the Redeemer's ancestry (4:18-22 cf. Matt. 1:5).

The one who fully decides for Christ and gives up all for Him shall receive a hundredfold in this life and in the world to come eternal life.

The story of Ruth is a fine example, first, of right racial relationship. The union of Ruth with Israel was around the true God. And, second, of dispensational truth:

(1) The famine in the land indicates the testing of the Jews in the great tribulation.

(2) The going into Moab indicates the sojourn of the Israelites among the nations.

(3) The sickness and death in Moab indicates the chastisement of the Jews and their sorrows in the present age.

(4) The return to the land indicates the gathering of Israel to their own land, Palestine.

(5) Ruth's decision indicates the gathering of the Gentiles through the influence of the Jews.

(6) The marriage between Boaz and Ruth indicates the union of the church with Jesus Christ.

Adds Charm to Character

Small kindnesses, small courtesies, small considerations, habitually practiced in our social intercourse, give a greater charm to the character than the display of great talents and accomplishments.—Kelty.

Finding Happiness

God made the world to be happy in, but all the happiness some people get is hunting for trouble on a dark night with a dim lantern.—Herald of Gospel Liberty.

THE STORY

Renewing a childhood attachment, Ernestine Briceland, of a wealthy family, is attracted by Will Todd, newspaper artist, son of a carpenter. They lunch together and recall their school days. Ernestine's sister, Lillian, knowing their father would disapprove, urges her to end the affair, but Ernestine refuses. The love-making progresses rapidly. They make a runaway marriage.

"Not at all," said Will quickly. "But anyhow, we are married. I know this strikes you suddenly, sir, but we just decided in haste, and as we want nothing but your blessing—"

"Be still!" exclaimed papa passionately, and he turned to Ernestine. "Where were you married? By whom?"

Will took the conversation into his own hands with deliberation.

"We went to town about noon, went to the courthouse and got our license, then to a jeweler and bought the ring and waited while it was engraved." Ernestine held up her slim hand, and showed the astonishing gold band on her third finger. "Then we took a taxi out to my mother's house, got her and went to the church I was reared in, in Avondale, and were married."

"But why this mad haste?" spluttered papa, who was almost incoherent. "Ernestine," turning to his daughter, in renewed determination to have nothing to do with Will, "what's got into you? I am sure you have been under some dreadful influence. I can't understand how you could act this way. I can't believe it."

He was furious, he was undone, but he still had a note of command in his voice. Ernestine felt his strength with terror.

"Papa—" she began, but Will cut in resolutely, so that in spite of papa's determination to talk to Ernestine the situation narrowed itself constantly to papa and Will.

"Ernestine was afraid, sir, that you might try to separate us. My own instinct in the matter was that we should talk this over with you, but I see, now, that she was right. You must understand, sir, that we are married, and your objections are futile."

"Ernestine had reason to fear me," papa said in a voice none of them had ever heard from him before. Ernestine felt herself shrivel under it. Papa had no intention of considering himself futile.

"She had reason to fear me, and so had you. I suspect your fear was more important than her own. Even if she were a fool, you might have been decent about it. I have no intention whatever of letting her go away from here with you. You'll learn, sir, that there are such things as annulments, even as divorce. Just because she has made one foolish mistake, is no reason why I should let her ruin her whole life. You have behaved very badly, but your behavior ends here and now. Ernestine stays here. You may go, and I will deal with you outside the house."

Ernestine felt that everything was lost, but Will only laughed. If papa were new and strange, so was her young husband, for he seemed to glow, to fill out, to be bigger and stronger.

"Don't be silly," he said. "Ernestine is of age. She married me of her own free will, and if you tried any such stunts, she would say so. Our marriage is entirely legal. It stands before everything else. She is now my wife, and my home is her home, and you can't detain her."

"We'll see," said papa grimly, and then mamma broke in.

"You shouldn't have, Ernestine. Your shouldn't have run off and got married, without telling mamma. It's the biggest, the most important thing in your life—and to take such a step without your people knowing it! I can't bear to think you'd go off and be married—and not tell me."

"I'm sorry, mamma," said Ernestine in distress, and papa took things up again. He had made a decision.

"Go to your room, Ernestine," he said in a voice of stern command, "and stay there until I can talk to you. If you ladies will excuse us, we will settle this among ourselves. Do you hear me?" he said sharply, turning his furious eyes upon Ernestine. She faltered, half turned to go in automatic command, for papa had always ruled his home, without much effort, but Will put his hand on her arm.

"Stay here, Ernestine," he said in a low voice, and she paused, undecided, while mamma and Lillian seemed to be grouped together on the other side of the room.

"I can understand your distress, sir," said Will. "I can see just how you feel about this, not knowing me at all and not understanding my motives. But you exceed your authority. If you should detain Ernestine here by force, I have only to go out and get the nearest policeman and come back for her. You can't do it."

There was a moment of incredulous silence, and papa half turned to Loring, in appeal, and Loring said in a low tone, "He's right."

Will followed this advantage swiftly.

"After all, what have you against me, except you think I may want Ernestine's money? We have decided to do without that. I'm not a stranger to you. You've known my father for thirty years. You know my people, that they are honorable and decent. There's no reason at all why I shouldn't make any marriage I choose, even with Ernestine. I'm working. I can take care of her."

Papa raised his clenched fist above his head, as though he would strike Will, and Ernestine made a little moan and mamma screamed. But Loring put his hand on papa's arm, and drew him back. And in that moment Lillian went to Ernestine and put her arms around her and kissed her.

"Oh, Lill!" Ernestine cried, and burst into terrible tears. "Papa, papa," she cried, turning from Lillian to her father, and holding out her hands, "don't quarrel with us. I can't bear it. I love Will. I wanted to marry him. Let us go ahead with our own married life, now, but don't quarrel with us."

Of Course Papa Was Helpless, and He Said So With a Shrug.

"It's you who have broken faith," said papa. "Not your mother and I. You've put this stranger before us. You can't have both."

Ernestine was appalled.

"You mean that I can't come home?"

Papa attained a grim smile.

"That's what I mean," he said, but now mamma broke in hysterically.

"I won't be separated from Ernestine. I won't permit it," she cried, and went to her younger daughter and took her in her arms. "Darling, you can come home as long as mamma lives here. I will see you every day. It's dreadful. It's hard on all of us, and it will be terrible for you. But mamma will not let her little girl go away like this."

"Elaine!" said papa, but she turned to him, as full of anger as he.

"The child is married," she exclaimed. "She may have made a mistake, but if she has, it is only a reason for standing by her. This is my home, as well as yours. I won't be instructed to let my little girl go out friendless. You may do what you like with me, and send me away, too, if you can, but I am going to see Ernestine. I am going to have her here."

Of course papa was helpless, and he said so with a shrug.

"Mamma," said Ernestine, "I am willing to take the responsibility for my marriage. After all, it's I who married Will."

"Not you alone," said mamma vigorously. "The whole family has married him, and we may as well realize it. For nobody marries just one of the Bricelands. We are all going to stand together, always. Papa, we will have to make the best of it. The marriage will have to stand."

Papa would not look at her, nor answer.

"We'll have to go," said Will.

"Goodby, darling," said mamma, and embraced her. "I'll see you soon."

"Goodby, papa," Ernestine faltered, but papa held his stubborn attitude.

"I'll have to go upstairs and get some things," murmured Ernestine, as they went into the hall.

Lillian went upstairs with Ernestine. Mamma came out and put her hand on Will's arm.

"Be good to her," she implored. "If you can't take care of her, if she's not happy, let her come back."

"I will, Mrs. Briceland," he said soberly. "I appreciate what you have done."

Mamma wept afresh.

"It is hard for her father. He worships her. You must understand him. It is a terrible blow to him. He will come around."

The girls came down the stairs, and after a moment Ernestine and Will were out in the dark street again, with her small dressing case in Will's hands. The family stood about in the living room in stricken silence.

The silence lasted for some moments, then Mrs. Briceland turned to her husband.

"You should never have let her go off like that," she said reproachfully. "What will she do?"

"I had no intention of letting her go, if you hadn't interfered," he exclaimed. "I was only threatening her with the loss of the family, in order to get her to stay here—to gain a little time."

"She wouldn't have done it," said Lillian. "She's too crazy about him. It probably was her idea that they get married first. She meant it. You couldn't have kept her."

"How much do you suppose he earns, on the Sun?" asked mamma, and Loring answered:

"Probably anywhere from twenty-five to forty dollars a week."

At that papa threw up his hands in a gesture of despair and turned to leave the room, but he looked back at his wife darkly.

"If you had stood by me," he said to her, "if we had all stood together, we could have held her here. You went back on me, both you and Lillian. It gave them courage. Now, you can think of her, God knows where, with that upstart." He went into the hall, and mamma followed him, her bright persistent voice coming down the stair:

"You shouldn't have let them go. We might have kept them both here, and taken care of them. Lewis, you'll have to make up your mind to give in, and get him a better job—"

The voices trailed off, and an upstairs door closed upon them. Grandmother went stiffly out of the room. Lillian began to move about the room, satisfying her need for order by pushing the chairs in place, straightening the pillows and moving the things on the table. Loring stood by the fire, staring into it, his face flushed, one hand opening and closing nervously. Lillian came and spoke to him in a voice which was already like mamma's.

"I'm sorry you got into this," she said. "It's terrible. How can Ernestine act that way? She's the most haphazard thing. But this is the worst yet. I feel as though she had ruined herself. But you aren't going to be angry with her, are you, Loring?"

"No," he said. "No, I won't be angry with her. Your mother's right. The family must stand by her."

Lillian shuddered a little.

"It seems dreadful to me," she said. "Ernestine out somewhere in Chicago, with that man. I don't see how she can be crazy about him in the first place, and how she could have married him in the second."

Loring reached out his hand and ran his fingers down the crepe sleeve of her dress, caught her fingers and held them in his own.

"Would you do that much," he asked wistfully, "if you cared for a man? Would you defy everything for him?"

"I don't know," said Lillian honestly. "I don't know. I want things nice. I want some plan and arrangement to my life."

"But if the man you cared for was not—eligible," he persisted, "would you marry him anyhow?"

"It's not a fair question," protested Lillian, and then added softly: "I don't know what I would do. Because I've cared for only one man, and he has been eligible in every way. So I can't imagine how I would act under other circumstances."

There was a little silence, and then he said, in a stifled voice:

"Is it I, Lillian?"

She looked up at him, and his face was full of suffering. Her own was compassionate.

"Did you care for Ernestine, Loring?" she asked him, but he shook himself quickly.

"No, no!" he exclaimed. "Not—that way. I'm fond of her. She's been like a little sister to me, always. But it's you I care for. It's you I want for my wife. Is it possible that you care for me, Lillian?"

"I always have," she answered simply, and he stared down at her, and again his voice was queer and strained.

"I'm like Ernestine," he said, "what I want is love."

She put up her fair sweet face, and he kissed her placid lips.

"I love you, Loring," she assured him, and he took her roughly into his arms.

"You hurt me," she complained in a moment, and he released her and stood holding her hand gently.

"I want love," he said again with poignancy, and Lillian assured him in her quick bright voice that she loved him.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Grecian Influence on Culture of Old Rome

Almost as far back as the history of Rome extends Greek influences are to be traced in the development of Roman culture. The Roman people were conservative and slow to cultivate the artistic sense. Rome had little creative genius. In her whole history she did not produce an artist such as Phidias and Praxiteles. The nature of the Roman was unusually practical and idealized power, law and profit. The Romans never created a distinctive style of architecture such as the Greeks. They borrowed their architecture from the Etruscans and the Greeks. The literary life of Rome has a profound effect upon mankind—Cicero with his orations, political and educational treatises; Caesar with his commentaries on the Gallic war; Sallust with his history of Rome; the poets Lucretius and Catullus. These poets, however, do not compare with the Iliad and Odyssey of Homer, the Greek philosophers Plato and Aristotle, Socrates, Xenophon and the orators Lysis and Isocrates.

Known Only by Tradition

Tradition has attached the name of Dismas to the thief who repented on the cross, when the Savior was crucified, and Gestas to the impenitent one. Both names are highly improbable.

SPORTS CLOTHES ARE PRACTICAL; TINY-PATTERNED DARK PRINTS

WHILE fashion has been turning toward fluffy and exquisitely feminine apparel for afternoon and evening, it has been getting more practical and efficient in the matter of sports clothes. The definite line of demarcation between active sports attire and clothes for luncheon, teas and dinners has sent each off on totally different roads.

Now one sees mechanics' jumpers and trousers on smart beaches, and shirts and shorts on tennis courts. Which goes to show that sports clothes are as practical and as wearable this season as can possibly be. Even dressier sportswear is made of very practical materials, and along lines making them most comfortable and timely for the given sport.

Take for example the strong, softly lustrous durene broadcloth tennis frock illustrated. It may be worn for the most active kind of tennis and will stand the test and strain to the entire satisfaction of its wearer. This admirable frock is not at all different, except perhaps in details of decoration, from the tennis frocks the crack English women champions like to wear to tournaments. At the same time it may be properly and pleasingly worn for spectator sports, because its lines are charming. Its low cut scalloped neck with a little bow tied across the neckline is tres chic. The scalloped arrangement of the yoke which gives a snug fit to the pleated skirt is also very neat and smart. There's no question about this gown being definitely "pour les sports."

The character and quality of the cotton woven into the fabrics for these chic plus practical costumes is very important. Now that fashion decrees

TENNIS FROCK OF DURENE BROADCLOTH

In the making of the graceful little informal afternoon frocks of dark silk print which have been so very popular and which give every promise of a continued vogue for midseason and early fall, the trend is for one circular ruffle to call for another. In other words, frocks show a tendency to adopt circular-flare movements from neckline to hemline. The frock in the picture below very aptly illustrates the idea.

Here we have a very smart styling given to a green-on-black print silk, which carries out a consistent circular movement throughout the capelet, the sleeves and the skirt. This manipulation, which strives to relate the frock or costume through repetition of a given treatment, is observed by most designers. For instance a pleated capelet, let us say, calls for pleated frills on the sleeves, also a pleated flounce on the skirt if the latter be not pleated entire. In case of an ensemble wrap of matching material, it also is likely to be detailed with pleated trimming.

There is quite a rivalry between pleated and circular treatments this season. However, from the standpoint of that which is newest, circular cuts win out. It is interesting to note in how many directions the circular "lines" extend. One sees the undulating grace of circular ruffles in the very smart peplum effects which style so many of this season's silk frocks. The sleeve with a circular flare from the elbow is among the many quaint modes which fashion has resurrected from the past.

Even pleated skirts have gone circular. That is, while not attaining low luster rather than highly luminous materials, a great deal of interest is being shown in durened cotton which has that sought-for low lustrous appearance together with a reliable durability as well as washability.

The rising tide of cottons has also established the popularity and smartness of cotton fabrics for sports millinery. Designers with a genius for hat making are creating cunning berets of pique and of broadcloth in white or colors, decorating them at the side with perky bows and sometimes starched flowers of self material.

the extreme sunburst flares, yet they are cut slightly bell fashion so that the pleats are shallower at the top than the bottom. Box pleated skirts are especially handled in this way.

Regarding the new fall silks, tiny allover patternings interpreted in nubbed and interwoven effects are conspicuously displayed in the early fabric showings. Also jacquard effects are sponsored. Little cravat motifs woven in the same coloring as the background are very smart.

Up-to-Date Store Front an Asset to Merchant

"Clever and attractive arrangements of stores and store fronts is a decided inducement to the buying public and is being given careful attention by the progressive merchant when considering entering business of any nature," says a prominent Detroit merchant. "Scores of such changes have taken place in Detroit's downtown property in the last few years which resulted in surprisingly large increases in retail sales for the merchant.

"Property owners are aware of the fact that a small amount of money spent in altering and improving a building means an added income from rentals, and greatly increases his chances for keeping the building regularly occupied. The comparatively low cost of all lines of building materials and the surplus of labor available this season offer property owners of out-of-date and rundown buildings the greatest opportunity in years to complete these needed improvements at a very low cost.

"It is expected that the larger building and improvement programs now maturing with the government, utilities and large industrial manufacturers will soon bring both labor and building material cost back to a normal basis of supply and demand." —Detroit News.

Touch of Naturalness in Use of Flagstones

Oftentimes we see an otherwise charming landscape or a beautiful garden and sense that something is missing. It seems to lack naturalness. Your landscape architect would spot the discord at once. He would probably suggest that you take out that artificial paving or flooring and substitute natural flagstone.

Nowadays we even have artificial sun lamps, yet there is no real substitute for natural sunshine in the scheme of nature. Nor will flagstone ever be improved upon for giving your garden, your grounds, your landscape that elusive naturalness without which the general scheme falls flat.

For the interior, too, where the keynote is a rustic atmosphere or rough finish, flagstones are in excellent taste. For fireplaces, sun parlors, vestibules, for porch floors, architects nowadays specify flagstone. Nature has been free enough with her supplies of flagstone so that it is not a luxury.—Boston Herald.

Plants That Draw Birds

There are many plants which are especially attractive to birds. The planting of these may bring many varieties of birds to the home garden. Mulberry trees, because of their fruit, bring robins, catbirds, swallows, warblers, thrushes, orioles and scarlet tanagers to the yard. The fall fruit of the mountain ash trees appeals to robins and thrushes. Warblers are fond of larch trees because of the insects usually found on them, and elms attract orioles for nesting. Cedars protect many birds from stormy weather, and the small chipping sparrow always selects an arbor vitae or spruce in which to build a nest. All garden berry bushes, as well as grapes and viburnums, attract many species of birds.

Cutting Fire Loss

The evils of fire-inviting construction have received tremendous publicity of late. Our annual fire loss is estimated at $500,000,000. Builders and owners are coming to realize that all construction should be truly fire-resistant, whether built of wood fully protected or of incombustible material. The superiority of metal lath and plaster protection for wood studs and joints has been recognized for years through general knowledge of the material and successful stopping of fire in many buildings.—Chicago Post.

Hedge Possibilities

The trimmed hedge presents a formal architectural appearance, consequently it is used extensively in place of low or even high walls, to bound the outdoor living room and also along terraces and as an element in the makeup of a formal garden. The kind of plants used for hedges of this type varies with the locality and requirements as to height and density. Hedges are used in gardens as a boundary to the garden, or to bound flower beds, and to parallel walks or divide spaces purely as an ornamental feature.

Beautify Highways

Prizes are now presented by the Royal Automobile club for the most attractive of service stations on roadsides in England. The Roads Beautifying association has arranged for trees to be planted along many roads. It is now interesting local authorities in giving opportunities for the planting of "remembrance trees," whether in memory or to commemorate a historic event.

Consider the Driveway

A neat and serviceable driveway to the garage should be considered in the general modernization plan for the exterior beautification of a home place, because the appearance of the garage and the approach to it are important features of the home picture.

HISTORY'S MYSTERIES

Unsolved Riddles That Still Puzzle Authorities Here and Abroad

Who Killed James Maybrick?

BOTH on account of the fact that she was the daughter of a banker in Mobile, Ala., and because the death of her husband was surrounded by the most mysterious circumstances, the trial and subsequent imprisonment of Mrs. Mary Chandler Maybrick for the murder of her English husband caused a widespread sensation on both sides of the Atlantic and threatened for a while to lead to a diplomatic break between London and Washington. Mrs. Maybrick's final release in 1905 was heralded as a final confession of error on the part of British law and a vindication of the woman who had been wrongfully imprisoned for fifteen long years. But even this did not clear up the mystery connected with the death of James Maybrick.

Mary Elizabeth Chandler, who was destined to play a leading role in this tragedy of legal mistakes, married James Maybrick of Liverpool when she was eighteen years of age. During the second year of their marriage a son was born to them and, later, a daughter.

For eight years the married life of the Maybricks appeared to be as happy and pleasant as possible. Then, apparently without any explanation whatever, Maybrick developed the temper of a brute, finally beating his wife and turning her out into the street. Evidence produced at the trial, however, showed that Maybrick had become a confirmed arsenic-eater and this was understood to account for his sudden alteration in habits and disposition.

Following the brutality of her husband, Mrs. Maybrick sued for a divorce but, on account of the children, the couple were reconciled and lived together quietly for a short time. In the spring of 1889, however, Maybrick was taken ill and died a short time later, presumably from natural causes. The dead man's family, however, maintained that there had been foul play and insisted upon having the body exhumed, particularly as they announced that they had discovered no less than seventy grains of arsenic concealed in the room which Mrs. Maybrick had shared with her husband.

In spite of the fact that minute examination of the body disclosed the presence of only one-tenth of a grain of arsenic and medical authorities stated that two grains was the smallest dose which could possibly prove fatal, Mrs. Maybrick was arrested on the charge of murder and the ensuing trial was one of the most sensational in the annals of the British courts. The attorney for the defense proved conclusively that Maybrick had been in the habit of eating enough arsenic to kill a dozen men and showed that he had continually bought large quantities of this poison for his personal use. The prosecution countered with the statement that this alleged habit of the dead man was a fabrication invented for the sole purpose of explaining the arsenic found in the house after Maybrick's death and exploded a bomb-shell in the shape of evidence that Mrs. Maybrick had purchased flypaper containing arsenic which she had soaked out, stating that she intended to use this as a complexion bleach.

But, as the concluding statement of the counsel for the defense showed, Mrs. Maybrick had been the first to give the alarm when her husband had been taken ill and, as her lawyer put it, "if she had wished to set every one in the house and the doctors themselves on the scent of poison, she could not have acted differently."

Sir Fitzjames Stephen, presiding judge, delivered a long and rather rambling address to the jury which appeared, at first, to favor the defendant but which concluded with what was practically a demand for her conviction and the jury, after being out only thirty-eight minutes, returned with a verdict of "guilty as charged." Shortly afterwards the judge went mad and the Liverpool Post in commenting upon the matter said: "In fancy, one still hears the distant fanfare of the trumpets as the judges with quaint pageantry pass down the hall, and still the mind's eye sees the crimson-clad figure of the great mad judge as he sat down to try his last case. A tragedy, indeed, was played upon the bench no less than in the dock."

Having been sentenced to the gallows, Mrs. Maybrick remained in prison for seven weeks and then, after having been warned that her execution would take place within a few days, was suddenly reprieved and her sentence commuted to life imprisonment. During the years that followed an almost constant stream of diplomatic messages about the American woman passed between London and Washington, but it was not until fifteen years after she had entered prison that Mrs. Maybrick was released on a "ticket to leave"—with the mystery of what had really caused the death of her husband still unsolved.

Aerial Studio for Africa

Built especially for the photographing of an area of 63,000 square miles in northern Rhodesia, an airplane is soon to be put into commission. The machine is literally an aerial photographic studio. It can be flown at a height of 20,000 feet and remain at this altitude for seven and one-half hours while the pilot and photographer map the country below. As most of the flights will be over a wild country the plane has two engines so that if one fails the other will carry the machine to safety.

CORN BORER PATROL HAS STARTED WORK IN INDIANA

Indiana's corn borer patrol assumed its posts Thursday around the areas infested by the European corn borer, Frank N. Wallace, state entomologist, announced.

Some 50 state guards were stationed on main highways to prevent transportation of green corn from the quarantined counties and townships.

At the same time a force of 100 federal scouts began a survey of other sections adjoining infected sections to determine the spread of the pest.

Federal tabulations showed 292 townships in 30 Indiana counties were infested last fall. In additio, 22 townships adjoining or surrounding by infested sections, were added to the quarantine list.

The quarantine list includes 314 townships, 100 of which were not included in the ban a year ago.

Counties shown as totally infested by the corn borer are: Adams, Allen, DeKalb, Decatur, Elkhart, Huntington, Jay, Kosciusko, LaGrange, Marshall, Noble, St. Joseph, Steuben, Wells, Whitley, and Wabash.

Counties reported as only partly infested are: Laporte, Porter, Starke, Fulton, Howard, Madison, Delaware, Henry and Union.

DON'T GROPE IN THE DARK

Many folks do their buying as though they were blindfolded, "I'll try this," or "I think this will do." These folks have only the vaguest idea of what they want as they spend large slices of the family income.

Other people read the advertisements regularly and buy with their eyes open. They know what they want before they go to buy.

Advertisements are beams of light on merchandise. They reveal to folks the latest and best products and improvements of the manufacturers and merchants.

Advertisements are records of progress. They are interesting and instructive news of what is best and cheapest in the business world. They light the way to better living. It pays the merchant to advertise and tell the folks he wants to reach, of the values, the fashions and the prices he has to offer. It pays people to read advertisements regularly because they will be albe to live better at less cost.

PERCHES FOR THE GROWING CHICKS

(By Prof. H. D. Munroe)

With the newer knowledge of feeding, fear of crooked breast bones in poultry, caused by early roosting, has been eliminated. Crooked breast bones are caused by the lack of sunlight and minerals. Early roosting does not cause this trouble. There are many chick troubles that can be prevented by early roosting and no harm can come from it. Early roosting prevents crowding, saves litter, makes it easier to clean the brooder house, prevents coccidiosis and keeps the birds in good condition and appearance.

Small, low perches should be placed in the brooder house when the chicks are two weeks old. Small perches about four feet long and on blocks four inches high are very desirable. These roosts are placed around the hover. As soon as the chicks learn to use these perches they should be encouraged to roost in the back of the brooder house. Temporary perches should be placed about one foot from the floor. As soon as the birds are old enough to take away the stove put in enough perches. The roosts should be about two and one half feet from the floor and about sixteen inches apart. The entire brooder house should be used for roosting.

Many poultrymen use a roosting arrangement which saves time and prevents smothering from crowding during the early brooding period. On all sides of the brooder house, except the front, roosts are attached to the side of the house about two feet from the floor. The roosts are attached to a frame which is hinged to the wall. On the lower side of the roosts, and covering the whole frame, poultry wire is stretched. When the chicks are small the front side of the frame rests on the floor. This gives the birds low perches. The wire under the roosts prevents the chicks from crowding to the corners. Even if they do crowd, those on the bottom of the pile will not smother. This roosting arrangement also keeps the chicks from getting into the droppings.

Early roosting should be encouraged. It will not cause crooked breast bones and this practice is one of the important parts of good brooding.

VOL. XLIV — ST. JOE, DeKALB COUNTY, INDIANA, THURSDAY, AUGUST 7, 1930 — NUMBER 32

MRS. THORNTON WRITES OF WORK AT CAPITOL

1446 N. St. Northwest,
Wash., D. C., July 29, 1930

Dear Editor:

That cold wave from Alaska is due to arrive tonight so I'll hased and for just this once, since you have asked it. Ill be the Washington correspondent for the St. Joe News.

For a fortnight the weather has been extremely warm and dry; the grass is seared and the parched leaves are falling. Today the mercury rose to 96. Government employees were dismissed at 2:30 P. M. instead of at the usual closing hour at 4:30. I believe that for six days the temperature was above 100 degrees which was a record.

We have received the St. Joe News regularly and it is indeed real news to us and we eagerly await its visit. Our interest in the friends "back home" does not wane and we appreciate this opportunity to say "Hello, folks. Come to see us. Fred misses your cheery greetings and the encouragement you gave him; Charles and Geraldine would rather see St. Joe than take a trip to Europe; and I—well, I just give myself a pat on the back and say I've had a good day today."

The work at the Census Bureau would interest no one more than it would Mr. and Mrs. Fred Hall altho many asked me to write about what is done with those schedules. The Bureau does seemingly endless things with them and when not in use they are kept in fire-proof vaults and under no circumstances are they allowed to be taken away from the Census Bureau. I work with the Population schedules but I cannot readily explain that to you. I wil say that your name has little or nothing to do with the information transcribed or statistics compiled. The Bureau receives daily a flood of queries by telegraph, telephone and letter, many of which cannot be answered because of the confidential nature of the Census information and many will be answered in due time when Census statistics are published. The schedules are supposed to be regarded with much seriousness but I have edited and coded many amusing things. When I had an item of an ex-sheriff being out of employment for three and one half years because of "a change in politics" I felt like calling an investigation —or the police — but later I found a man recorded as out of employment for twenty years and still another for twenty-six years then I wondered how long this situation has prevailed. One line which said "no occupation—he's dead" struck me as being funny until I found it to be a nineteen year old boy—then I thot it tragic! (Persons who died April first or later were to be enumerated.) To me, thus far at least, the work is highly interesting because the enumerators and their people whom I "red ink" are not just so many names but "real folks from all over the world and I'm glad to meet most of them.

Almost every person that one meets here is from somewhere else as very few are native Washingtonians. Official circles Government employees and, at this season of the year, tourists comprise the masses. (And negroes the other mass it seems to me.)

There are so many street beggars. Some have pencils, postcards or the like to sell but more just hold out a tin cup asking for money. The man with the monkey and grind-organ or maybe just the organ is not obsolete here. He grinds out the music and sympathetic listeners toss out the nickels. There is a transportation war on at present. Street car fares advanced to ten cents last week. A flock of nickel cabs appeared on the streets and there are regular busses, cabs, and "35 cent Stop-me" Taxis besides the street cars.

A marvelous building program is being put on by Uncle Sam. Whole blocks of old buildings are being razed to make room for new Government buildings, parks and boulevards. Thirty years from now Washington will prabably be the world's most beautiful capital. To us, it already is the world's greatest capital, is it not? I wish that every citizen could come here, if for only a brief stay.

We are expecting Misses Cleota Morr and Martha Miser soon. How eagerly we are anticipating their coming you can only imagine! So if you want a close-up of us, see them when they return. Perhaps, too, they will be able to tell you many interesting things about this lovely city which I could not include in this letter.

Sincerely yours,
Mabelle Thornton.

P. S. And please notice, I never even mentioned Congress or Farm Relief. Well, Congress has adjourned and the drouth is relieving the farmers I guess—of what little they were counting on, eh?
M. S. T.

Hammer Mill Now in Operation

We have just completed the installation of our new Hammer Mill and are now in a position to give you grinding that the community around St. Joe has been waiting for.

It is equipped with a powerful Electric Magnetic Separator that all grain passes over before entering the mill and removes all bolts, nuts, nails, wire or metal of all kinds, which is a most important protection to your stock.

WE put this grinder in for YOU, now make use of it.

Give it a arial and you will come back for more grinding.

FOUND STEALING GASOLINE; RUN, BUT ARE CAUGHT

George W. McPherson, 44, and his son-in-law, Osmer Eix, 23, two confessed gasoline thieves living two miles east of Spencerville, were remanded to jail in Auburn by Judge Endicott of the DaKalb circuit court Wednesday for further investigation after appearing before him to answer on a charge of petit larceny.

The two were arrested by Sheriff John C. Armstrong and his deputy, Art Zimmerman, early Wednesday morning after the officers had trailed them to New Haven.

McPherson and Eix were caught siphoning gasoline from a supply tank at the gravel pit of Kimes & Kraft located on the St. Joe river east of Spencerville. For some time gasoline had been missing from the Kimes & Kraft tank and from the tank at the Frank Butler gravel pit nearby.

Lying in wait for the thieves Tuesday night, Harold Kraft observed a car driving up to the Butler tank about 2 o'clock Wednesday morning. A man jumped out and attempted to siphon gas, but the tank had been drained the night before. McPherson went to the other pit and started to siphon gas from the tank, while Eix remained in the car. McPherson was ordered to surrender, but ran and Eix drove the car away. Mr. Kraft shot at the boy when he failed to stop the car at Mr. Kimes' orders. The two men escaped and the sheriff was telephoned for. He and his deputy succeeded in finding the thieves.

McPherson and Eix entered pleas of guilty to an affidavit signed by Mr. Kraft charging the theft of 100 gallons of gasoline valued at $18.

TOWN BOARD ISSUES ORDERS

Driving the fire truck from the engine house by anyone other than by orders of some member of the fire company was positively prohibited by the town board at its meeting, Monday evening.

This ruling became necessary when it was told that Saturday morning Marshall Williams took the truck and drove it to the rear of the Hanna & Storer garage where trash was set on fire, and when it got started spread in the grass and threatened other buildings.

They probably got buck fever when it became beyond their control, so the marshal rang the bell a few taps to summon help.

When all the facts surrounding this fire were presented the expense was ordred paid from the marshal's salary.

MOVES FROM AUBURN

Cecil Likes and family moved last Saturday from Auburn, in with Mrs. Virginia Lawson. Mrs. Likes will take care of Mrs. Lawson and Cecil will work out. Freeda Lawson has been taking care of her grandmother for the summer, but due to her being in school at Angola, she went home to prepare for the fall term.

Refreshments.

The committee who have planned the program have outlined a model Farm Bureau meeting that will be entertaining and instructive. The entire meeting will only consume ninety minutes. f visiting is desired there will be ample opportunity during the refreshment part of the program.

CELEBRATE FIFTY SECOND WEDDING ANNIVERSARY

S. M. High and wife, of Jackson township were married fifty-two years ago last Wednesday, and while there was no great demonstration, yet Mr. and Mrs. High reflected on the half century of years with great pride, as they recalled the many obstacles that confronted them during this time.

Mr. High is 75 years old the 25th and Mrs. High is 73. He was born on the old High farm, the house being located where the Ryan home is now standing. When his father died he bought the north half and his brother, Leat, bought the south half, and he has never lived away from his early home.

During the evening, Mr. and Mrs. H. M. Philips and Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Farver of Auburn came for lunch and brought many good things with them.

Mr. and Mrs. High are highly respected residents of Jackson township and they are enjoying quite good health in their declining years.

CELEBRATES ANNIVERSARY

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Akins celebrated their fifteenth wedding anniversary Tuesday evening, by having a specially prepared dinner and entertained Mr. and Mrs. Don Blair and son, Bruce and Mrs. E. A. Chapman and son, Max, of Butler. Hollis Akins also celebrated his birthday at this time. A sample of the cake was presented ye editor and wife and we will say that Mrs. Akins surely knows how to bake angel food cake and would recommend her to any one,

We guarantee to satisfy you when we accept your order for printing.

NEW SALES AGENCY INCORPORATED

The Miller Auto Sales, Inc., a local organization at Spencerville, have secured the authorized Ford dealers contract, and they report splendid sales since their organization about ten days ago. The personnel of the agency, its salesmen and mechanics, follow: F. W. Silberg, Vinton Miller, Joseph Koch, Rollie Zeider, formerly of the Dickmeyer Chevrolet Agency at Auburn, Dale Stoffer, formerly of the Kroger Co., Carl Tustison and D. W. Baughman.

Since this organization started to selling the Ford cars ten new cars have been sold in addition to many used cars.

New cars are in stock at all times and prompt deliveries of any model desired can be made.

No part of the new Ford cars need any special comment as they are far superior to the famous Model T, that practically every one in this community at one time or other, owned.

The new agency will endeavor to serve their patrons promptly.

DEATH BY SMALLPOX AT NEWVILLE

Fred Jacob Cook, born February 24, 1926 at Hicksville, son of Mr. and Mrs. Dallas Cook, of Newville, died July 31, of smallpox after but eight hours illness. The child was 4 years, 5 months and 7 days old. Surviving besides the parents are one sister and three brothers.

A short service was held at the house in the afternoon, conducted by Rev. Aldrich, with burial in the Newville cemetery, E. R. Kinsey in charge.

At the time of the death the mother had little thought of smallpox, but upon investigation it later developed that the possible cause of the death, was due to a lack of the breaking out.

No other case was reported in the community at the time of the death, and reports are that no other member of the Cook family have taken ill since.

HICKSVILLE ENDURANCE BIKE CONTEST STILL ON

The Hicksville endurance bike, which is piloted by Walter Belknap, William Rodocker, Raymond Lilly and Richard Laub, four Hicksville lads, were still going today, having passed 325 hours.

The quartet started the grind at midnight, Thursday, July 24, and the wheels of the bike have not stopped since. The boys ride two hours and then are off for six. Each one rides six hours per day in three different periods.

The boys are doing the riding on the high school grounds, North Main street, and the exhibition has been attended by a large number of people at all hours of the day and night. The rider slides forward on the bicycle, jumps off after his successor has mounted from the rear, so that the wheels never stop.

Robert Nelson is the fifth member of the crew. Nelson runs a pop stand at the school ground to help finance the program.

The present record is said to be held by a group of Indiana boys, who rode for 17 days.

WITH THE RURAL HOUSEWIVES

The R. H. Club was pleasantly entertained at the home of Mrs. Pluma Hamilton Thursday, afternoon, July 23. Due to the illness of Mrs. Hamilton that day, Miss Margaret acted as hostess and served dainty refreshments of ice cream, cake and lemonade.

Birthday showers were given at this meeting for Mrs. Minnie Gee and Mrs. Leona Mason.

Club meets with Mrs. Winifred Hart, Friday afternoon, August 8.

WHEN
To Start Saving

WHENEVER earning begins, saving should begin.

This is the way to get started in the right direction and when it is started when you are young you keep it up because you realize it's the right thing to do.

Some people never learn to save mainly because they never have given it a thought until they wake up some day and find they made the biggest mistake of their lives. They need money urgently—and they haven't any.

It is never too late to start saving. Begin today and don't stop. OUR BANK is an ideal place to start.

Land of Sagas

Typical "Row House" of Rural Iceland.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

ICELAND'S celebration this summer of the thousandth anniversary of the organization of her popular assembly, the Althing, finds a country that has advanced like the rest of the world in its chief city, but has retained the simple life in its rural districts. So simple is rural life that in many parts of the island the villages and farms are not connected by roads; only trails exist, and all travel is done on pony back.

The island's one sizable city is Reykjavik, the capital. Of the 104,000 people in Iceland, about 25,000 live in Reykjavik.

Politics was responsible for the first settlement in Iceland, and fish brought about its development. Ingolf and Hjorleif, two disgruntled chiefs of Norway who refused to acknowledge Harald Haafager, the first Norwegian king, settled on the southern shore of the island in 871 A. D. When the value of the fishing grounds found by these pioneers became known, a number of Scandinavian settlements came into existence.

For hundreds of years Reykjavik was only a small fishing village and trading post. But the village had the good fortune to be situated on one of the best available harbors. As the population of Iceland increased and commerce grew, this spacious harbor became a popular haven for trading vessels, and steadily the city grew.

To the visitor approaching by water, Reykjavik's commercial aspect conceals all evidence of the fact that this city has been the capital of Iceland since 1800 and its seat of learning. Scores of fishing craft and commercial vessels, battered by the sea and in need of paint, dot the anchorage. The quays are lined with warehouses, and here and there along the shore are cod-drying grounds, white with slabs of fish. Anchored vessels may be seen filling their holds with alternate layers of fresh fish and salt, thus preserving the fish for a quick trip to northern European ports.

Scenes in Reykjavik.

After one lands, however, and enters the city, commerce is no longer dominant. Broad streets are lined with rather gaudily painted wooden and corrugated iron houses. Along the streets American automobiles dart.

The Asturvollura, the city square, is the center of interest in Reykjavik. Facing it is the great stone house in which the thousand-year-old Althing meets every two years. On another side is the cathedral, built of stone, but with a tower of wood. It was built in 1847. In the center of the square is a statue of Thorvaldsen, famous sculptor of Iceland. This statue was a gift from the city of Copenhagen in 1874.

In another part of the city are the buildings of the Iceland university, which was only recently established—1911. In the same section are the museum and library, the latter housing 80,000 books and manuscripts. In the museum is a collection of Icelandic antiquities, geological specimens, and objects of industrial art.

A unique feature of the capital city is its public laundry of naturally heated water from hot springs that were once geysers.

Because of the lack of roads in many parts of the island all the travel is done on pony back. But out from Reykjavik, Akureyri, and even smaller towns, roads are reaching farther and farther; and Icelanders vision the day—many of them not without sadness—when the pony will lose his all important place in the Icelandic transportation system, and when automobiles will bowl along over a network of highways that penetrates even the seared volcanic wastes of the interior.

Farming and fishing are the chief industries. Forty-seven thousand Shetland ponies are raised, chiefly for export, and the sheep number about 900,000. During the short summer season many vegetables can be raised, but the potatoes grow only to the size of walnuts. The grass is usually cut by hand because it is so short, and the whole family takes part in the haying process.

Its Ancient Sagas.

Iceland is the land of the Sagas, the oldest literature of Europe, of which Sir Rider Haggard says: "Too ample, too prolix, too crowded with detail, they cannot vie in art with the epics of Greece; but in their pictures of life, simple and heroic, they fall beneath no literature in the world, save the Iliad and the Odyssey alone."

The language in use today is the same as the ancient language of all Scandinavian countries, the Icelanders alone having preserved it, chiefly due to the remoteness of their island.

Since December 1, 1918, Iceland has been recognized as an independent state, united with Denmark only through the identity of the sovereign. The island is about 310 miles long from east to west and 190 miles wide from north to south, with an area of 40,000 square miles.

More than one-eighth of the island is covered with glaciers, and an equal area is covered with old lava fields. An automobile trip over one of these fields of desolation shows a picture of destruction difficult to describe.

In the small country villages the meals are excellent. But the hosts are very apologetic for being unable to provide what they think the visitor would like to eat. Naturally the tinned food which is a luxury to them, and to which travelers are more than accustomed, can very well be omitted in favor of their fresh chicken, excellent haddock, and fresh-water salmon.

In Iceland, as in Norway, many plants and flowers are grown indoors, and some especially large geranium blooms are to be seen.

Historic House Rebuilt.

For Iceland's millennial celebration an early Icelander's house that was burned 819 years ago was reconstructed. The new house duplicates, as nearly as possible, the historic home of one of Iceland's greatest lawyers—Njal. He was learned in the voluminous and technical law of Viking Iceland before William the Conqueror brought the English jury system to England on the end of a Norman spear.

Iceland has rebuilt Njal's home because the fame of his legal skill, together with the story of his death amid melodramatic scenes, has been preserved in one of the most cherished of Iceland's sagas, "The Story of Burnt Njal." The saga came into being eleven years after Lief Ericson's journey from Greenland to American shores, which was in the year 1000 A. D.

The appearance of many Viking houses resembled a street of modern row houses in eastern United States and seaboard cities. The triangular Viking gable ends ranging in a line suggested a series of cottages shoulder to shoulder, but each Viking gable roof usually sheltered a single room. The whole sprawling Viking house of many gables was connected by a narrow hall that linked the rooms in the same way that covered passages link up the many buildings of a New England farmhouse. Turf often roofed the Viking's house, and in spring he lived beneath a carpet of wild flowers.

Interior of the Residence.

Leading men of the island, such as Njal, usually had one high-roofed, large hall in their houses. This hall had three divisions lengthwise; a nave and two low side aisles separated by low stone walls. The high roof of the nave was supported by two lines of wooden pillars brought over stormy seas from Norway in the small Viking ships. This hall was a sleeping, eating and living room for the chief and his retainers. Some of these halls, which served as eating, living and sleeping rooms, were very large. One in Iceland was 200 feet long and 60 feet wide.

Down the center of the hall was one long fireplace. The smoke from the fire found its way out through holes cut high up in the roof. Benches for the family, servants and retainers ran along each side of the long fireplace. In the low-roofed aisles parallel to the long axis of the hall were bunks for sleeping. These bunks usually had swinging doors which locked on the inside so that the sleeper could lock himself in his compartment.

Such a house was burned down over Njal's head. Njal had been too successful in the Iceland courts. He knew Icelandic law so well he could repeat it all from memory. So he, his sons, and his friends and servants were attacked by a rival gang. With spears and battle axes they beat off the attackers who finally set fire to a haystack which in turn fired the house. Women and children were permitted to go out safely, except Bergthora, Njal's wife, who chose to stay with her husband. Njal himself was too old to fight so he and Bergthora lay down together, covered themselves with an ox hide and awaited their fate.

The SANDMAN STORY

ABOUT ZOO ANIMALS

WHEN all the people have gone home the animals in the zoo talk to each other, sometimes they talk about the times they were free, sometimes they talk of what they like best about the zoo and about their own family ways—and sometimes they talk about the people who come to visit them, and laugh at the different ways people have.

"People say," remarked the Rocky mountain bear, "that we don't get any chance to do as we please when we're in the zoo. They say we aren't free. But I fooled them yesterday."

"You did, indeed," said Muff and Ruff in chorus. Muff and Ruff were two Russian bears who were neighbors of the Rocky mountain bear.

"I Don't Believe You Will," Said Mr. Red Fox.

"And you gave me away," said the Rocky mountain bear. "But no matter, I had my little outing."

"I couldn't bear it when I saw you bend your wires and manage to escape," said Muff.

"And so we both growled as hard as we could," said Ruff.

"That was what made the keeper see what had happened," said the Rocky mountain bear. "He didn't know whether I was down in my cave or not."

"But we kept on growling," said Muff, "and he came back once more to see what had happened. My, we were envious."

"Oh, yes, I had a fine walk and stroll around the park," said the Rocky mountain bear, "and when they came to catch me and bring me back they said that they were so frightened when they heard I had escaped.

"For they said my temper wasn't always as perfect as it might be and so they were afraid! Ha, ha, growl, growl, I frightened them when I had my walk!

"I didn't do any harm, but I did what I pleased. I walked where I wanted to walk. I enjoyed myself. I fooled them yesterday, all right.

"It took eight of the creatures they call men to bring me back again. That was something for a Rocky mountain bear to boast about—eight men to bring him home!

"And so, Muff and Ruff, though you were so envious you made my walk shorter yesterday by letting the keeper know something was up, or rather out; still I had a fine, free time, and I fooled the keeper."

"You frightened them, too, you lucky bear," said Muff and Ruff.

"Oh," said Mr. Gray Fox, "I wish I had got out of the zoo. I'm going to try. I'm going to climb up the side of my cage, and I'll escape. I will."

"I don't believe you will," said Mr. Red Fox. "The keepers weren't on the lookout for the bear doing this, but they are on their guard about you. They know that a gray fox will try to get away by climbing and climbing over the top of anything he can, a tree, a fence or anything."

"Now we would try to escape through one of the entrances to our home. We always have three entrances so we can get out of one doorway in our hole-home if we are attacked from one of the other two. You don't care about digging and burrowing—you would rather climb. You're not as clever as we are. You are not nearly so foxy."

"Oh," said Mr. Gray Fox, "I know that you are very clever and tricky and deserve that name, but I am worse than you are! There! As I said before, I don't care about anything. If I were free I would only think of myself. Here I only think of myself.

"I don't think of Mrs. Gray Fox or the little ones. I only think of myself. I hate the keeper. I hate my family.

"No, I'm the gray fox, the sly, treacherous gray fox. Just now I don't believe I will try to escape for I am sleepy.

"But if ever I do you can think of me as out in the great world, perhaps back in my old home—being as cross and selfish as I was here in the zoo, and not feeling sorry about it in the least."

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

THUMBS UP

THERE is a common New England superstition that if, when a person closes his fist, his thumb sticks up he is a capable or an honest man, whereas thieves and rascals, they say, always double their thumbs in when closing the hand. There is here a clear echo from the days of the gladiators—the "pollicies verto" and the "pollicies premo" of the Romans. When in a gladitorial combat the vanquished was not killed but lay at the mercy of his antagonist the people decided his fate. If they decreed his death they extended their hands with the thumbs bent under and concealed; if his life they reach forth with the thumb extended outward and up. With the humane and the just among the spectators it was thumbs up; with the blood-thirsty and the criminally inclined it was thumbs concealed.

The Roman legions lift their eagles high no more and the stars glimmer through the loops of time in the Flavian amphitheater. But when we consider that out of the ruins of that Old Roman world the world of today was built up, and that for over four hundred years Old England was Roman it is not surprising that among the superstitions of New England still linger echoes from the days of the Caesars.

THE "BANSHEE"

"SSH! QUIET, or the banshee will surely get you!"

It is with these cautionary words that many a mother sends her little child off to sleep.

For the banshee is believed to be a dreadful creature that does harm to people and frequently kidnaps children.

In Ireland particularly, which is presumed to be the native habitat of the banshee, is it believed to be a spectre which warns of the approach of death.

The word itself is a corruption of the Gaelic "Bean sidhe," meaning woman-fairy.

GABBY GERTIE

"Many a motor trip is just a bum ride."

Dear Editor:

WHEN I was a boy we read Diamond Dick in secret. It was reprehensible because the books were supposed in some mysterious way to upset our morals. What they probably did was to weaken our eyesight and ruin our digestion.

Those were the books wherein the hero went night and day without eating or sleeping or paying attention to routine physiological matters. It seemed heroic and smart to skip a meal.

Nowadays such a hero would be hygiene-minded. Here's a sample, perhaps. "Rudolph rose, stretched, sipped three glasses of water, brushed his teeth with a downward motion, and started his morning exercises. Fifteen minutes later he sat down to a heaping bowl of oatmeal with one spoonful of sugar."

No reader of such a healthful book would grow up a dyspeptic. I wonder that some one does not reprint the old dime novels with new dietetic health hints written in. If we're going to give our babies pre-chewed carrots we ought also to sterilize their reading.—Fred Barton.

SILENCES

CHARLES LAMB, in his letter to Coleridge, writes about "The silent thoughts arising in a good man's mind in lonely places." The mountain top may be a lonely place but its silence affords a splendid opportunity for a person to "Retire in the sanctuary of his own heart."

When the top of the mountain is high enough to be above the storm we may witness a majestic sight.

L. A. Barrett.

Above us is the cerulean blue, below are the elements in the turmoil of a storm. One can see the flashes of lightning and hear the peals of thunder. The storm has no effect upon the person above it except to incite wonder and admiration. Peace and security abides above the storm.

Life's storms are quite like these tragic occasions in nature when thunder crashes and lightning flashes. Storms of sorrow and failures are likely to master us if we permit ourselves to become victims of their depressing influence. If we can, however, climb into the mountain top of a strong mental and spiritual faith and witness these storms from above, we rise above them. We are thus able to master the storm rather than be mastered by it. This silence of mastery is a rare but most worthy attitude of mind and heart to acquire.

In the silence one can learn not only the lesson of self mastery but that very much needed trait of self-control. There is something fine about one's ability to heap coals of fire upon another. Many a battle has been won by silence. Occasionally we witness a person becoming famous by what he did not say. The silent look is the most severe rebuke. The silent attitude of mind and heart wins many a battle in which conflicting forces war for supremacy.

In the rush of our modern age we need hours of retirement. We need to go into "a desert place and rest awhile." In the silence of retirement one not only recovers his lost energy but acquires a new vision and fresh courage for life's work. It is possible to recapture one's soul through rest. Longfellow writes about laboring "for an inward stillness, an inward healing, a perfect silence where lips and heart are still, and we no longer entertain imperfect thoughts and vain opinions."

"Let us be silent that we may hear the whispers of the gods."—Emerson.

Shift to Cities Checked

The farm-to-city shift of population, which in 1926 had given indications of reaching alarming proportions, has fallen away until during 1929 the loss to the farms was only 269,000.

It is estimated that 1,876,000 persons left farms to reside in the cities, but during the same period 1,237,000 left the cities for the farms. Helping to balance the shift were the 631,000 births on the farms, with only 281,000 deaths. During the peak year of 1926 more than 2,100,000 persons left the farms for the cities.

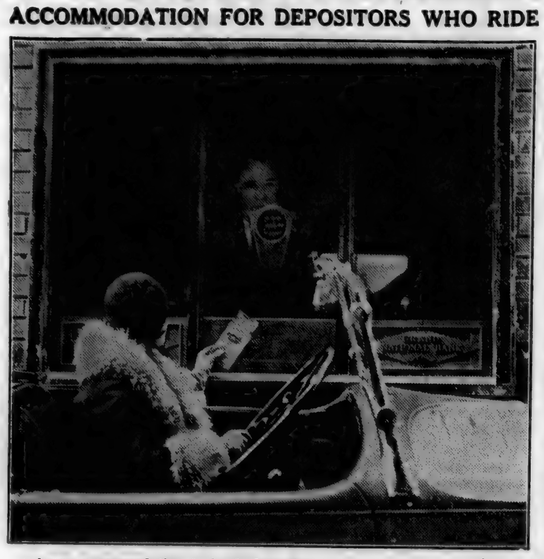
ACCOMMODATION FOR DEPOSITORS WHO RIDE



As an accommodation to bank depositors who have not enough time to park their auto, a "traffic window" has been installed by a local bank in St. Louis, Mo., at which persons can do business without leaving the seat of their machine.

ESTIMATING COST OF CAR FOR HOME

Where Records Are Kept Real Running Cost of Machine Easily Found.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Many men who do not see the advantage of other home accounts like to keep records on the cost of owning and operating their automobiles. Perhaps this is because the man of the house has more to do with the car than with other family commodities. The bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture has provided a special page for the automobile in the household account book it has designed. In the directions for keeping home accounts, the person who writes the record, whether husband or wife, is reminded of the various items which should not be overlooked in connection with owning and running the car.

Makeup of Complete Picture.

A complete picture includes not only expenditures for gas, oil, repairs, tires and other replacements, fire, theft and liability insurance, tax, license plates, care such as washing and greasing, and garage if one is rented; but also annual depreciation as shown by comparing the turn-in at the end of the year with the buying price or list value at the beginning of the year. Cars depreciate both from use or wearing of parts, and from obsolescence or style changes, even when used very little. The turn-in value of a used car often bears little relation to its mileage or the care given it. Interest paid on installment notes and loss of interest on capital invested would also be added in an exact computation.

The real running cost per mile is easily found by dividing the year's total cost for all these items by the year's total mileage. Some people reckon their cost per mile only in terms of gas, oil, and repairs or replacements.

As the running cost of a car will differ but little whether one person or five ride in it, it is obviously economical for a family to use this means of transportation, especially for long or roundabout trips. It may also happen that for the sake of companionship on such trips, an automobile owner will offer to take friends with him. This is a very delightful form of hospitality which most drivers enjoy. Another plan is for four or five friends to divide among themselves the cost of a long journey. But in this case it happens quite commonly that an unintentional injustice is done the owner of the car in estimating what this cost is. The real running cost includes "overhead" as well as cash expended en route.

Running Cost Per Mile.

To illustrate: Assuming that Mr. A owns an average medium-priced car, its running cost per mile, including everything, would probably range between 6½ and 7 cents. The United States government reimburses its employees using their own cars on government business on a basis of 7 cents per mile. Mr. A and four friends, taking a 500-mile trip on an expense-sharing basis should estimate the total cost at $35, although less than $10 may be spent for gas and oil en route. A moment's thought should convince the fair-minded that either before or after such a trip the car would require putting into good condition; following it, washing and greasing would undoubtedly be required, the tires would be more worn even if not immediately replaced, and other expenses due to conditions of the trip might appear. While depreciation may be partly a matter of time as well as of mileage, these other costs are inescapable for the owner. The fact that his friends have had pleasure, comfort, convenience, and, after all, cheap transportation in the car, should lead to a generous point of view on their part in sharing the cost of the ride.

THE MOTOR QUIZ

(How Many Can You Answer?)

Q. When was the first oil well drilled?

Ans. Seventy years ago at Titusville, Pa. The start of the great industry was made when a well with a daily flow of 1,000 gallons was brought in.

Q. What should be done when a car is hard to start?

Ans. Have battery tested, make sure connections are clean and tight, check the spark plugs and breaker points for proper adjustment, and examine the choke.

Q. How many cars and trucks were produced in the United States and Canada in 1929?

Ans. Five million six hundred and 51 thousand, an increase of about 22 per cent over the previous year. Production included 4,846,000 cars and 805,000 trucks.

Q. How much gasoline are American motorists estimated to have used in 1929?

Ans. Approximately fourteen billion gallons. This would make a lake five miles in diameter and four miles deep.

Taking Time Exposures on Automobile Fender

Taking time exposures on the road requires a level support, which is usually not found on an auto. It is an easy matter to provide one, however. Take a tin saucer, cover it with heavy cloth and tack it to a small square piece of wood, preferably plywood. The inverted saucer is set snugly on the fender so that the board on which the camera is set is level. This enables the tourist to take a picture in any direction with no trouble and a minimum loss of time.—Harold E. Benson, Denver, Colo., in Popular Mechanics Magazine.

Camera Support Set on Auto Fender for Taking Time Exposures.

AUTOMOBILE NOTES

Headlights should not dim when the car goes faster unless the battery is weak or the generator isn't charging properly.

HIS WIFE WAS ALWAYS A GREAT BOOSTER

(© by D. J. Walsh.)

THERE were eight finely written pages in the letter which it had taken an extra stamp to send.

Alice Draper read every word, slowly, with the pained look deepening on her face.

Twenty-one years before Margaret Wells and Alice had been married under the same floral arch. A double wedding, and the prettiest one of the year, too, so everybody had said. Margaret, of course, was the loveliest bride and Richard Burling the handsomest bridegroom. From the start everything was in their favor. Richard soon worked up to a high-salaried job on the road. Orson Draper, working for the same firm, was held back in the office.

Alice folded the pages and put them back into the envelope. She had a sense of helplessness at a time when she would have given aid. There was nothing she could do. Margaret lived far away. If she went to her—she shook her head. She could write, of course, but anything she could say would sound so futile. She must think a lot before she wrote at all.

Meanwhile, her own tasks and duties pressed more heavily than ever. And she was worried about her husband. Orson hadn't been sleeping good of late or eating as much as he should. Sometimes of an evening she found him staring over the edge of his newspaper.

This letter of Margaret's seemed somehow to be horribly revealing. Richard at first had slept and eaten poorly and stared. Then had come the first awful outburst, after which things had never been the same between husband and wife. In fact, as Margaret said in her letter, they had simply gone on from that point to worse and worse.

All day as she worked Alice thought about the letter and her own problems, which seemed now to bear a strange likeness to Margaret's, as they had been at first. She was getting the boy ready for his first year in college. David would come from his camping trip in a few days and would leave almost immediately for the university. She had to have everything in readiness for him to pack. All this took time and careful consideration. Then as chairman of an important committee she must devise some plan whereby her club could add to its finances before the year closed. She wanted her plan to be fresh enough to attract attention. She was reading everything that she could lay her hands on in the hope of finding some workable idea. Then, also, she had wrenched her shoulder in a way that the doctor seemed grave about. She hadn't told any one about that. And, lastly, there was Orson. She was more troubled about him than about all the rest.

That night she had an unusually appetizing supper—roast pork, potatoes mashed to a fluff, homemade rolls, a shortcake for dessert. She had finished a new frock and she put it on. She looked nice; although twinges of pain left her a bit white about the lips. Just before time for Orson to drive up the street she turned on the lights. It was raining and storming and she wanted the cheer of his home to go out to him.

Yet, as she waited for him, she had an appalling sense of wasted effort. Suppose that just as Richard Burling had grown tired of Margaret, Orson had grown tired of her! She loved him. But what if in their middle age, with a boy ready for college, her husband had ceased to love her!

When he opened the door she met him with the old, quick, cheery greetings. He answered in kind, "How've you been, Alice?"

"Fine. Dinner's just ready to serve."

They sat down at opposite sides of the pretty table.

"Roast pork, eh?" Orson said. "That looks good." He helped her and then himself and began to eat as if the food tasted to his liking. Neither talked during the meal. This was not unusual, for Alice realized that Orson had been talking all day. After matching his wits with other men's her small affairs couldn't interest him to any great extent.

While she washed the dishes he looked at his newspaper. Presently she came into the room and, sitting down, took up her sewing. After a few moments she lifted her eyes and saw that her husband was regarding her intently. At that moment her shoulder gave a fierce twinge. She came near crying out, not so much with physical pain as with heart's agony. Her hands trembled as she tried to resume her stitching on David's pajamas.

Orson flung aside his paper and settled back in his chair.

"I got a letter from Dick the other day," he remarked. "He's ready to quit Margaret. He doesn't seem to think she's lived up to her contract. I'm sorry for Dick."

"I heard from Margaret. She has her side, I think." Alice spoke guardedly. "He is tired of her, that's all."

"Yes, he's tired of her—darn tired," Orson said warmly. He reached into his pocket. "There's the letter. Read it." He tossed the envelope into her lap.

Alice read the letter. It was brief, but terribly vital. She was shocked by what Richard had torn out of his heart to show the one friend he felt he could speak to. She sighed as she finished reading.

"Do you want to read Margaret's letter, Orson?"

"No! I have no sympathy with Margaret. A woman who takes all and gives nothing! You see what Dick says there. He's going to throw up his job and go. That ends him." He sat silent for a moment. "The firm has asked me to take over his territory."

"That means you will leave home and travel! You have always wanted to do that!" Alice tried to smile with stiff, bluish lips.

Orson, not looking at her, laughed. "That was before I got a settled habit in life. I'd rather take less salary and stay at home. If it's all the same to you." He looked at her keenly.

"There are no two ways of thinking about that," Alice said, suddenly glowing with joy. She went over to his chair, sat down on the arm, and put her cheek against his. He encircled her with his arm and held her close.

"You've made me too comfortable, Alice," Orson said. "When I've come home nights, tired as a dog, you've had food, love, understanding to give me. Every morning you've sent me forth with renewed spirit. You never complained when money was tight or I was too worried over something to remember your birthday with the customary box of candy."

"That only happened twice," Alice reminded him gently.

"You've been a great booster. And, I'll admit it, I'm the kind of fellow who needs boosting—occasionally. I don't know what I'd been without you, old girl. That's what poor Dick lacked—his wife's sympathy. For 20 years she's kept his nose on the grindstone; she needn't be surprised at what's happened. I've envied Dick. There's been times when I hankered after his job. Now I can have it—"

Alice waited. Her heart beat fast.

"But aside from the fact I like my own job too well, I can't take Dick's. That's what's been nagging at me, ever since I heard from Dick. I knew you'd like a little more money, that's natural. We'll have to skimp to put the boy through college. But he's got a big mind; he'll amount to a lot more than his father ever will—you're sure you feel about this job business just the way I do?"

"Sure," said Alice.

"Then you write to Margaret. And I'll write to Dick. Maybe we can do something for them yet—"

"There's the door-bell!" exclaimed Alice.

It was a messenger with a night telegram. Alice tore it open.

"From Margaret!" she said. "'Dick's going to stay. My fault. Letter to follow.'" She read the words aloud, holding the paper with one hand while she wiped tears off her cheek with the other.

"Now then," said Orson, gaily, "when you write to Margaret be right on your job every word you say. Boost Dick for all he's worth. You can do it."

"Sure, I can do it," replied Alice as she hurried across the room toward her little writing desk.

Turkey Refuses to Sell Royal Floating Palace

Turkey's precious royal pleasure galley dating from the reign of Sultan Mohammed IV will never be sold no matter how many flattering offers are made, according to the director of the naval museum. A British enterprise recently offered the government a large sum for this unique craft, proposing to take it to the United States for exhibition purposes. The offer was rejected.

The galley, believed to date back to 1650, is 40 meters long, five and a half meters wide, two and a half meters deep and weighs 150 tons. It was manned by 144 men, three to each oar. The paint used at that time was so good that even now it is almost as fresh as when new, particularly the blue. The gilded prow is long and sharp, but the remainder of the galley is curiously overhung, after the fashion of ancient Venetian craft. In the stern is the imperial cabin with a triple cupola supported by columns and completely overlaid with mother-of-pearl and tortoise-shell mosaic, studded with garnet glass. The cabin is flanked by two glass gilded gryphons and entered through a balustrade adorned with four large balls of cloudy crystal.

In addition to this masterpiece of medieval boat-builders' art, there are thirteen other caiques in the same building—graceful craft once propelled with gilded oars, scores of which are stacked in the half-forgotten naval museum beside the Golden horn.

Dutch Republic

The first stadtholder of Holland was William of Nassau, styled the Great, who was killed by an assassin, an alleged hireling of Philip II of Spain, July 10, 1534. The princes of Orange, stadtholders during the Dutch republic, founded the royal house now represented by Wilhelmina of Holland and princess of Orange-Nassau.

William the Great recovered the principality of Orange in 1559, and led the revolt which under pacification of Ghent led to the union of the north and south provinces.

The house of Orange was overthrown by the French in 1795, but restored in 1813, and two years later the prince assumed the title of king of the Netherlands.

Hospitality

A GENEROUS host was Thomas Jefferson. So lavish were his entertainments and so great the demands upon his hospitality that the "Sage of Monticello" became almost bankrupt. University of Virginia students recently enacted the above scene at the Jefferson mansion near Charlottesville, Va.

Southern France Clings to Beloved Bullfight

There are many things which distinguish the north of France from the south. The one drinks beer or cider, the other drinks wine. The one cooks with butter, the other with oil. The one eats leeks and the other garlic. Above all, writes a correspondent of the London Sunday Observer, the Midi has never quite forgiven Paris for having passed the law which makes bullfights illegal. Not that the Midi observes the law, which is openly and flagrantly defied, and the authorities dare not enforce it.

Recently, six bulls were killed on a Sunday afternoon at Beziers before an enormous crowd, and at the end of the entertainment a member of the municipal council made a speech, in which he referred to the art and the poetry to be found in the display. Other bullfights have recently taken place, or are announced, at Arles, at Nimes, at Grasse and at Bordeaux, and there is even talk of one as near Paris as Compiegne.

Goodly Supply

Jimmy was taking a motor trip to California with his father and mother, and each little western town through which they passed had a signboard, giving the name of the village, and underneath, awaiting the results of the census, the abbreviation "Pop." with a blank space for the number of inhabitants. Jimmy observed this for several hours, and then he exclaimed, "Gee, isn't it funny? Every town we go through has pop for sale!"

People ought to get dry behind the ears these days.

Business conditions are unsettled because so many accounts are.

Now do you suppose this weather is getting us ready for the next world?

Weather man says no relief in sight—well, we are not far from the river.

Sins of others are just simply awful. Sins of ourselves are just simply habit—justified habit.

This summer with its atmospherical and industrial conditions has given man his first real alibi for setting around in a good many years.

The knowledge box manicurists are busy getting the intellectual developing machinery in shape for the next year. Frank Curie and Marshall Andress are busy cleaning the school house. It won't be long now when the "kiddies" will have to leave off playing war and ball and take up the books again. Ain't it just too sad?

There is no loss without a gain. The dry weather has finished threshing up in great style. All out standing grain will be threshed this week. The wheat and oats will go to the bin in the best shape of many previous years. Hay was bailed in the field this year—a western custom, made possible by the dry weather. Many a straw stack was bailed the same day it was threshed and the bright yellow straw bore no signs of rust, dust, or rain effects. A good year in some ways.

The World Going Dry

The weather suggests many things—many facts, many truths. The weather is used to start many conversations and "good mornings." "Nice day today," "Well, it's some dry isn't it," etc. Weather typifies and suggests other ideas in the minds of men. Weather conditions control to a large extent the disposition of people in whom it comes in contact. For instance: The cloudless skies of the Nile Valley with its endless sunshine makes the natures sad, sedate, and over serious in religion and society, etc.

While in a rain soaked country of the South Sea Islanders pessimism takes hold of the mind and depresses it. But in a country with changeable weather conditions we find people more joyful and contented, as the weather reminds us that in variety there is spice of life. The one great thing about the weather is that mankind has nothing to do with its manipulation or variety and that accounts for it being so popular in every day discussion.

It's natural for men to honor and respect power and authority beyond the control of man. The reason why the weather never gets into politics or has no religious faith is because man has nothing to do with it. The weather man gets his orders from higher up.

If man had anything to do with the clouds we would have had rain long ago, and with it a lot of fights and quarrels worse than politics, love, war or religion ever put on. Some people who wanted to thresh today would have to wait until the party in control saw fit to dry things up and the party that wanted rain on his cabbage would curse the picnicers and golf players for having too much sunshine.

The section men would probably hurt somebody for having the rains all come at nights and Sundays. So the almighty was wise in not putting all things in the hands of man.

In these days of intense dryness weatherly speaking, man is reminded more than ever of his absolute dependence rather than his absolute independence in matters of weather, life, religion, morality and general social contact. These conditions reminds us "man proposes but God disposes." Some crops came through alright much to the surprise of all of us while others were burned up entirely—much to the surprise of all of us. Man didn't figure in much. All things move or stop according to the supernatural—this condition has caused man to respect the seat of authority. Conditions the world over indicate that man is finding out that a superior hand is running things—war, earthquakes, drouth, famine, etc. The idea that the radio and the automobile, and the large consumption of the earth's supply of oxogen by manufacturing interests of the world, has much to do with conditions as they are, is largely speculative. But the ideas that the cussedness, meanness, unchristian, unneighborly, attitude that men take is the cause of most of our maladies and grievances, is not far from right.

Eleven years ago or about, the citizens of this country put over the dry law or wrote into the organic law of the land the 18th amendment. Since that time all dry stomachs and red noses have been praying for rain—rain to dampen up the country and the world as it was back in the old days of schooners and pretsels, trying in every way to take the control of things in their own hands. They would control churches, politics, men's conscience, other peoples families, in fact, the whole earth. They would dwarf the moral codes of the whole world derived from the teaching of the Bible and the teaching of the church. Providence has made it possible for men to interfere (by the free moral agency plan) in the affairs of both church and state and men have not lost an opportunity along that line—if history is anything correct, but woe unto them that do the meddling and interfering.

It seems that providence is going to make things dry even if he has to use the weather to do it. What ever a man's aspirations are in this world, it better not be to obstruct the best that is intended for the good of the world. He will pay, and pay ,and pay. And conditions are evident that he is paying, and paying, and paying.

Except for the fact that the years 1929 and 1930 witnessed the crash on Wall Street and its results upon general prosperity—inducing unemployment of severe character—there would be no expectation on the part of the democratic leaders of Indiana of success in the state election next November.

The democratic leaders of course do not welcome unemployment as a road to political success. No one with fairness would accuse them of preferring political success, to the sound prosperity of their neighbors and fellow citizens. They are of course not to be criticized for making whatever political capital is offered by the general business and industrial conditions, — since republicans would do the same—were the tables reversed.

But of course Chairman Peters knows that the people of Indiana are victims of world-wide conditions which have constricted the consuming capacity of the world's population to a very unusual extent. The reasons for the world's condition are not well understood by the wisest of statesmen and thinkers. It is loosely called a "post-war collapse of buying power"—which is perhaps as clear a reason as any other. The troublesome thing is that—in the language of the late Mr. Cleveland "it is a condition and not a theory" that curtails employment and reduces earning and buying power.

Every sound hearted American of course wishes it were not true. It is a tragedy to lose or lack a job—far too serious to be indifferent about, or to play politics with. The saddest words a man can carry home to wife and children are "I have lost my job.'

Americans feel that way about it—since so nearly every one of us have seen the time when a job was about all we had.

But while Chairman Peters and his fellow leaders cannot be blamed for making the most of their chances—they should remember that the whole world is similarly suffering from slack work and dull business. The United States Department of Commerce makes it its business to keep informed about world conditions. In its recent report it is stated that in Germany the number of unemployed is 2,080,000 which is over four times the average of the five years preceding 1930.

This condition is costing Germany $308,000,000 a year for relief—being a frightful tax upon industry and business.

The number of unemployed in the British Isles is 1,151,000 for whose relief doles must be provided to the amount of $260,000,000.

Italy reports 396,000 idle and Poland 273,000. Austria whose ancient tyrannies still exact their penalties has 192,400 out of jobs—with a much restricted taxing power of peoples who formerly helped take our surplus off the market. Unsold surplus explains unemployment better than anything else.

No one would—if he himself were charged with such responsibility—proceed to load up warehouses until the new tariff law was passed. Every day's delay meant delay in starting the men back to work. Mr. Hoover and Mr. Watson held the republican regulars in line for the speedy enactment of the tariff bill into law.

But they who forced delay from day to day, from week to week, from month to month, are the real targets of the arrows of blame. They let the democratic senators of the south, anxious always to make trouble for the administration, make monkeys of them.

Every man who has had no work or little work—no time or part time—can turn to the exponents of insurgency in the senate and with rigid finger, exclaim with truth: "You kept me out of work."

And as the late Will Cumback used to say "that's the God's truth about the whole matter."

Goldsmith Memorials

Oliver Goldsmith's bi-centenary recently attracted many pilgrims to the modest stone on the north side of Temple church, which marks, as nearly as can be conjectured, the last resting-place of the creator of Doctor Primrose and Tony Lumpkin. There is, however, another London memorial of "rich-hearted Goldsmith," which is not nearly so well known as it deserves to be—a very handsome window in Southwark cathedral. The window, erected only a few years ago, fitly commemorates the poet's association with the south side borough, where, for a time, he practised as "poor physician of the poor."

WORK STARTED ON SHOEMAKER ROAD

No sooner had the sale of the bonds for the Henry D. Shoemaker road been announced on Saturday, than was the contractors, Baker & Dunn of St. Joe, busily engaged in getting to work on the construction of the gravel road north from a point two miles north of Waterloo to the Steuben county line.

The bonds sold at a premium of $338.40 to the Fletcher Savings and Trust company of Indianapolis.

Baker & Dunn, the contractors, have some very excellent equipment for building of gravel roads, and have the reputation of doing their work right and doing it without delay. It is gratifying to know that they have this contract as that means that the road will be completed in the least possible time. This firm has built some of the best gravel roads in this section of the state.

When the Shoemaker road is completed it will be the only north and south road improved through DeKalb county. On the north this same road connects with an improved gravel road to Pleasant Lake. In the south the road connects with an improved road south to the Leo road just west of Leo, running into Fort Wayne.—Waterloo Press.

A Print Above the Mantel Will Help to Relieve That Vacant Look Many Rooms Have.

Dear Beth:

I had the shock of my young life the other day. You remember Helen, and probably know she was married a month ago. She asked me to help her pick out her furnishings. They didn't have an awful lot of money to spend, but I thought we did remarkably well with the cash on hand. She drew a diagram of her apartment and I helped place the pieces where they would be most attractive and useful.

Imagine my chagrin when one of the girls dropped in the other day, and said that while Helen had some lovely things, the apartment was not a bit colorful—good looking but cold. Of course, if I wanted to be catty, I could have replied, "You should talk."

When I told her I had helped Helen, of course she started to back water. Believe me, I made all the speed possible to call on Helen. The other girl was pretty nearly right. I had advised getting a raisin-colored carpet, a neutral but not monotonous base. The upholstering was done in green and russet. So far, well and good.

Below the waistline, the apartment was everything you could ask for. The walls were a sort of putty gray color, and the draperies being at one end of the living room did not give enough color tone. The pictures she used were very neutral, and the room really looked pretty dull.

Naturally Helen asked my advice, and with just three things added, we put new life into that living room. An India print which she had received as a wedding present up on one wall, making a nice background for her desk and chair. A hanging book shelf in dull green and gold—with an antiqued effect—just what she needed—fitted perfectly over a console table. A medium-sized print filled in another open space. It had lots of reds and yellows in it, and accented the color scheme of the room admirably.

Helen knew something was wrong but she was afraid of going too far. In this day when color is so important, those three touches on the walls completed the picture formed by the furniture at the base.

I thought these things might interest you. If you have any questions, don't hesitate to ask them.

Love, Fern Eture.

YOUR COMMUNITY..

through ELECtric service is raised to the level of

A METROPOLIS

FURNISHING a power supply equivalent to metropolitan service to all communities on its lines, irrespective of size, is a major contribution of your electric company toward civic betterment. With such service available every town and village in the territory is a possible location for new industries.

The communities receiving their power supply from this company have many advantages over crowded metropolitan areas. Your electric company employs an industrial agent whose entire time is devoted to presenting these advantages to industrialists seeking favorable location.

Lesson for August 10

HANNAH, A GODLY MOTHER

LESSON TEXT—I Samuel 1:9-18, 24-28; 2:19.

GOLDEN TEXT—My son, hear the instruction of thy father, and forsake not the law of thy mother.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Hannah's Prayer Answered.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Hannah's Prayer Answered.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—How Can We Honor Our Parents?

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Value of a Godly Home.

I. Hannah's Sore Trial (1:1-8).

Elkanah had two wives in violation of God's law. God's primal thought for man was one wife. Therefore, for Adam he made Eve. Hannah's sore trial grew out of jealousy which naturally springs up between two women, wives of one man. The violation of this law of God concerning marriage has always been attended with trouble.

II. Hannah's Prayer (1:9-18).

She had the good sense to take her troubles to the Lord. This believers should do, even though the troubles result from sin.

1. Her bitterness of soul (v. 10).

Though Elkanah loved her and sought to lighten her burden, he was unable to bring to her the needed solace.

2. Her vow (v. 11).

Hannah prayed, asking God for a son. The name Samuel means "asked of God." In connection with her asking this gift from God, she vowed to give the child back to God. Much can be expected of children born into the world under such circumstances.

3. Hannah misjudged by Eli the priest (vv. 12-16).

The priest observing the motion of her lips and not hearing the sound of her voice concluded that she was intoxicated and demanded that she put away wine. She defended herself against this inference.

4. Blessed by Eli (vv. 17, 18).

Following her explanation he pronounced a blessing upon her, joining in the prayer that God would grant her petition.

III. Hannah Gives Samuel to the Lord (vv. 24-28).

For a time she cared for Samuel in the home. Always the best nurse for a child is its mother. According to her vow, at an early age she took Samuel to the sanctuary and gave him over to the charge of Eli, the priest, to minister therein. We thus see in his tender years Samuel's ministering before the Lord.

IV. Samuel's Ministry (ch. 3).

1. His call (vv. 1-10).

(1) The occasion.

From his birth Samuel was dedicated to the service of the Lord. While going about his regular duties the Lord spake unto him. In Samuel we have a striking pattern of child religion. In the Scriptures we have set forth two types of experience: First, the one who experiences God's saving grace after having lived in sin; second, the one brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord from infancy.

(2) His obedience.

When the divine voice was discerned Samuel rendered immediate obedience. He expressed his willingness before he knew what was required. He did not inquire what was wanted and then let his obedience depend upon the agreeableness of the command.

2. Samuel's prophetic message (vv. 11-18).

The time has now come for him to pass from the authority of Eli to that of the Lord. The first message entrusted to him was a most terrible one. He hesitated to tell it to Eli, but being pressed, he manifested true courage. It must have been a bitter experience to Eli to see Samuel recognized and himself passed by. This fearful visitation of judgment upon Eli's house was due to the sins of his sons. Eli was held responsible for not restraining them. He seems to have been a good man but lax in the discipline of his children. Parental laxity is most cruel. To tolerate evil when one has the power to restrain it is to become party to it.

V. Samuel Established in the Prophetic Office (3:19-21).

"And Samuel grew, and the Lord was with him, and did let none of his words fall to the ground. And all Israel from Dan even to Beersheba knew that Samuel was established to be a prophet to the Lord." Little did Hannah know that the boy who had been given in answer to her prayer would one day become the spiritual head of the nation. Truly, he that honors God shall be honored by God.

Character Most Important

The great equipment of the soul-winner is character. It is a false notion that we must meet the world on its own level—drink to win the drinker, smoke to win the smoker, and play the world's games in order to win it to Christ.—Richard Hobbs Mirth is the sweet wine of human life. It should be offered sparkling with zestful life unto God.—Henry Ward Beecher.

CHILDREN CRY FOR IT—

CHILDREN hate to take medicine as a rule, but every child loves the taste of Castoria. And this pure vegetable preparation is just as good as it tastes; just as bland and just as harmless as the recipe reads.

When Baby's cry warns of colic, a few drops of Castoria has him soothed, asleep again in a jiffy. Nothing is more valuable in diarrhea. When coated tongue or bad breath tell of constipation, invoke its gentle aid to cleanse and regulate a child's bowels. In colds or children's diseases, you should use it to keep the system from clogging.

Castoria is sold in every drug store; the genuine always bears Chas. H. Fletcher's signature.

She Lost 19 Pounds of Fat in 27 Days

During October a woman in Montana wrote—"My first bottle of Kruschen Salts lasted almost 4 weeks and during that time I lost 19 pounds of fat—Kruschen is all you claim for it—I feel better than I have for years."

Here's the recipe that banishes fat and brings into blossom all the natural attractiveness that every woman possesses.

Every morning take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen Salts in a glass of hot water before breakfast.

Be sure and do this every morning for "It's the little daily dose that takes off the fat."—Don't miss a morning. The Kruschen habit means that every particle of poisonous waste matter and harmful acids and gases are expelled from the system.

At the same time the stomach, liver, kidneys and bowels are toned up and the pure, fresh blood containing Nature's six life-giving salts is carried to every organ, gland, nerve and fibre of the body and this is followed by "that Kruschen feeling" of energetic health and activity that is reflected in bright eyes, clear skin, cheerful vivacity and charming figure.

If you want to lose fat with speed get an 85c bottle of Kruschen Salts from any live druggist anywhere in America with the distinct understanding that you must be satisfied with results or money back.

Beggars Can Choose

THE STORY

Renewing a childhood attachment, Ernestine Briceland, of a wealthy family, is attracted by Will Todd, newspaper artist, son of a carpenter. They lunch together and recall their school days. Ernestine's sister, Lillian, knowing their father would disapprove, urges her to end the affair, but Ernestine refuses. The love-making progresses rapidly. They make a runaway marriage. Briceland is furious, but helpless, as Ernestine is of age. Loring Hamilton, lawyer, wins Lillian's consent to be his wife.

CHAPTER III

Strange Country

It seemed a natural thing to Ernestine, however it seemed to the others, to waken on her marriage morning, in the little back bedroom of the tiny house where the Todds had lived all their married life. She was instantly wide awake and oriented. Perhaps it was the close tangle of Will's arms about her that made everything normal. Perhaps the delicious consciousness of new happiness had never entirely been lost in sleep. It did not matter at all about the family now.

Thinking of everything, Ernestine felt in her heart something new about Will. Added to her romantic love for him was something really more wonderful: a sound thing—respect. He had behaved admirably.

She was filled with a transport of tenderness, a strong conviction of having done well. Now, at last, life had begun for her. The chrysalis of girlhood was broken, and she was emerged into womanhood. She had become real. Always now, Will would be here beside her at the beginning of every day. Gravely she considered this, and sent up a wordless prayer that she might be a good wife.

Some one was moving about in the kitchen, and she heard the rattle of coals in the kitchen grate. How close and small the house was. Each sound came through the thin walls distinctly. Ernestine realized that she would have to close the window, and she essayed to rise. But at the first movement Will's arms tightened about her, though he did not waken. Ernestine extricated herself and got up with a swift strong movement.

"You have to work today, Will," she said in such a wifely tone that he laughed and looked up at her adoringly.

"I suppose now I've got somebody even worse than my mother about making me get up," he said, and then added, "Hey, wait, I'll get you some warm water," for Ernestine was washing her face in the basin that stood on a small washstand near the door.

But the water out of the pitcher, which had stood all night with the cold wind blowing through the open window upon it, was cold and invigorating.

Will shaved in the kitchen, and Ernestine could hear his voice, in an affectionate murmur, talking to some one. Before the small wavy mirror, she applied her make-up, looking at herself sharply. She arranged her sleek soft hair, proud of its thickness and texture. What was there in her face? Was she different this morning? She must not be different. She powdered again, and rubbed some of the scarlet off her lips, which were as red as cherries under the lip salve.

She made the bed neatly and set the room in order, packed up her belongings. The smell of coffee and the sound of the percolator made her feel faint. She had eaten nothing the evening before.

In the kitchen, Will's face turned on her, as bright as a triangular mirror with the sun on it. His mother was sitting by the kitchen table, with a warm shawl over her heavy dress. She could be up at times, and this morning she had made the effort. Ernestine went to Will's mother, and kissed her.

"I hope you didn't get up on our account, mother," she said gently, "but I'm glad you are better."

The woman looked up at Ernestine, her faded eyes, under the drooping brows, regarding this strange bird that had slipped so easily into her nest. How old she looked, thought Ernestine. She was a generation beyond mamma, for she was old with a gentle humility and meekness that Ernestine had never met before. There was not in her even the stubbornness that sometimes the meek can use so effectively.

Will's father Ernestine could understand. A carpenter, with a gift for woodcutting, he was a skilled and able workman and had a great pride in his trade. He was a tall, thin, stooped man, with a clean-shaved, heavily furrowed face and brightly saturnine, black eyes, which regarded Ernestine with a kind of grim humor. He made her realize without saying so, that he disapproved of their marriage as much as her people did, but that he was not the man to cry over spilled milk. They could count on his kindness.

At breakfast in the bright kitchen, Ernestine and Will made plans.

"You are welcome to stay here as long as you like," said Peter Todd, but the two shook their heads. They had already decided to be independent at once.

"We might just as well go today, and find a place to board until we can get an apartment," said Ernestine, looking very young and earnest. "I'll get my trunk from mamma's, as soon as we have found a residence. It's awfully good of you to want us here, but the house is small, and mother is really not well enough to have us."

Mrs. Todd said nothing, and Ernestine felt that she had never seen so dispirited a creature.

"If we get near town, mom," Will said, "we can save money on carfare. I know a place on Erie street one of the fellows told me about, where you can get a room and two meals, at a reasonable price, and it's in walking distance of the office. Anyhow, I think we ought to live alone."

"That's right," said Will's father. "It's the only way for young married people. If you need any money when you go to fixing up a flat I can lend you a little. I always have a few hundred dollars tucked away for emergencies," he explained to Ernestine. "I can let Will borrow, without interest, if he needs it. I own a house on Troy street that you could have if it wasn't leased. But the location is not good for you."

"We'll manage," said Will confidently, and Ernestine admired him.

They exchanged bright looks, and Mr. Todd said heartily:

"Well, come and visit us sometimes, anyhow."

It was soon time for them to go. Ernestine, in her squirrel coat and scarlet hat, bade her new relatives good-by. She felt that there were tears in the air, realized a little that these people were losing Will more definitely than she would ever be lost to her family. He was their only son, but they said good-by to him with quiet dignity. Ernestine admired their restraint, and was grateful for their good taste. They offered neither advice nor counsel, but allowed the young ones to go forth about their own affairs. The house on Erie street brought to Ernestine her first shock of reality. It was an ancient, smoke-blackened dwelling place, not far from the lake. Across the street from the house a five-story machine shop reverberated with activity. A secret-looking brown-stone house, with drawn blinds, stood on the corner. Ernestine felt that the apartment they spoke of so glibly was not so near. A sense of the irrevocable nature of the step she had taken swept over her. She was now Will's, and, as he had said to her father, his roof was her roof. His home was hers, and this was it. She had definitely abandoned her old way of life and set her feet in a strange country. The future was as remote from the past as though she were following him to a great distance.

"You Are Lovely," He Protested as Though She Had Denied It.

Hand in hand they ran up the stone stairs and met a small plump woman, called Mrs. Bennett, with whom Will discussed rooms and prices, while Ernestine stood to one side, burningly conscious of the gold band on her third finger.

* * * * * * * *

Ernestine was too good a sport to bemoan their conspicuous lack of money. Fresh from the rigors of a fine school, it was not hard for her to accustom herself to simplicity. Will discovered that she had a most practical nature. The forces which had driven her into marriage had not all been romantic. In adjusting herself to living on Will's pay, she was able to exercise some of her native ingenuity and shrewdness, and in that capacity she found a certain pleasure. It was fun to put herself on a basis of having no money to spend and then discovering how much she had grown accustomed to spending in the months since she had left school. Her trunk was full of pretty clothes. It was an element she did not at first appreciate.

CHAPTER IV

A Party at Pastano's

Mr. Poole was having a party for Ernestine and Will, and, according to prearrangement, Ernestine slipped downstairs ahead of time to show herself to Mrs. Bennett. She could not help but be proud of the evening dress mamma had given her for Christmas, and which she had not worn before. The yellow chiffon lay about her slender limbs delicately, subtly. She appreciated the illusive cobwebby hose that had come with the dress and the gold cloth slippers. The string of small real pearls which had come to her from her Grandmother Langley's estate, the pearl ring which daddy had given her to match her necklace, were the last touches of a perfect toilet. Will had appreciated her, this evening, his fine eyes glowing with admiration.

"You are lovely," he protested, as though she had denied it, and she swung herself about in the narrow room and gave him a languishing, mocking look. But she went down the carpeted stairs in a glow, her squirrel coat over her arm.

Mrs. Bennett got up with an admiring exclamation when Ernestine closed the door behind her. The latter advanced to the center of the room and pirouetted on her toes. A little, round, weary body, with tired eyes beneath a fringe of gray hair, Mrs. Bennett had long outworn personal egotism and was generous with praise and sympathy.

"Youth is the time to live, darling," she said to Ernestine. "My life is an old story, but you are young and glowing, and things are happening to you. It is better for you to have your hard times now, and grow old rich and strong, than to have the hardships in old age, as I have had them. But tell me, aren't you excited to be having a birthday party given in your honor by a great cartoonist?"

Ernestine laughed.

"He only wants to be nice to Will. He thinks it will please Will, and of course it does."

Mrs. Bennett maintained a discreet silence, and Ernestine turned to the mirror over a chest of drawers and looked at her reflection, running her hands over her sleek soft hair. She was a little thinner than she had been when she was married, and her eyes were big and dark in the delicate whiteness of her face. She was lovely with a breath-taking quality, her face shining with an inner spiritual excitement. It seemed to her as she stared that she looked too happy, too thrilled for every-day use. She must learn to dissemble.

"Sometimes, darling," Mrs. Bennett chided Ernestine gently, "I think you fail to realize what an effect you have on the people here—on the men. You are so different from the other girls these boys know. You bloom. You wear the face of love. It's hard on them. I want you to be very wise with Mr. Poole. It would be an easy thing for you to disrupt his friendship with Will. Will admires him, and his patronage means so much, just now."

"Will won't be jealous of any attention I pay to Mr. Poole, or that he pays to me," Ernestine said indifferently, "if that's what you mean. It won't hurt Mr. Poole to admire me. He's a nice old man, and he loves to admire women, and men, too, as far as that goes. It's part of his big heart, Will says. Anyhow, Will wouldn't be jealous of me—now." Her small face was so shining that Mrs. Bennett threw her advising instinct away with a gesture and came and kissed her young friend.

"Have a lovely time, darling. Pastano's has the distinction of being the very toughest place in all Chicago. It is beautiful, and not so dangerous as Mr. Pastano likes people to think. He is really very careful about the police. And then, too, you will be with Mr. Poole, who is a close friend of Ruby."

"Crackers" First Baked by Massachusetts Man

As far as any authentic record shows, the first cracker bakery in the United States was that of Theodore Pearson at Newburyport, Mass. He began business in 1792 and his specialty was a large cracker which was known both as a "pilot" and an ship's bread. Joshua Brent was Pearson's first great business rival. He erected an oven for cracker baking at Milton, Mass., in 1801. He was succeeded by many other cracker manufacturers. The crackers were first made by hand. During the years between 1840 and 1865 the mechanical process employed in making crackers underwent a remarkable development. Prior to 1840 the use of machinery in the cracker-making process was practically unknown. Even then the dough was still worked up and put into the oven one piece at a time. Machinery was finally invented which took the dough after it had been prepared by hand and rolled it into a thin sheet which, as it passed over a sort of endless belt, was cut by a stamping machine which works automatically.

Among curiosities unearthed in the course of excavations and restoration of the ancient basicilica of St. Sebastian in Rome was a theatrical mask worn by a Roman actor.

Explaining Abbreviation

Mo. was the abbreviation for Missouri because any other abbreviation would be likely to become confused with an abbreviation for Mississippi.

JACKETS IN GAY CONTRAST STYLISH; BIG BRIMS NOW TOP SHOWY PRINTS

A VOGUE which has been flourishing since early spring and which is scheduled to carry over through midseason and into early fall, with even greater emphasis, is that of the separate jacket or short coat which gaily contrasts the dress over which it is worn. Throughout the advance fall showings the theme is being interpreted in versatile ways.

Just now jackets in bright red are quite the thing worn over white sports dresses or those of natural colored shantung. The costume in the picture is typical. This outdoor ensemble which tops a white frock with a vivid red jacket is made of a bemberg material especially woven for sports wear. The dress is very simple, to all appearances, but it asserts its chic in such style-convincing details as a pitted-at-the-hipline skirt which develops wide box pleating at the hemline, also the square-cut neckline finished with a soft-tied bow at one side. The gown has short sleeves which is really much smarter than sleeveless. Take note of the narrow red suede belt, the red heels on the white kid pumps, the white beret with a flange made of the same fabric as the dress, and the white washable pull-on gloves, for these are all items which merge into a unit of ultra modishness.

TYPICAL MIDSEASON COSTUME

Jackets of every color will enliven the autumn landscape. A sprightly effect is that of the orange-colored coatee worn over the dress of primrose yellow, and then there are those lovely pastel combinations such as a jacket in Patou pink with the frock of hyacinth blue. Bright navy blue with white, the navy coat cut along nautical lines, is ever so popular. Usually the white shoes boast trimming touches which repeat the gay tone of the jacket.

Those little paletots which are creating such a furore this season, being so amusingly quaint and old-fashioned, are awfully smart. For these, velveteen is a favorite medium, tuned in coloring to the dress with which it is worn. For instance a brown and yellow print dress calls for a paletot of solid brown velveteen; if the paletot be fitted in basquelike forms, if the sleeves be nothing more or less than shoulder-cape flaps over the arm, so much the better, for it is the novelty of the thing which counts.

Midsummer is destined to make its exit midst extremely picturesque scenes so far as fashion is concerned. In its final gesture, the summer mode is staging with a grand flourish the loveliest of lovely big-of-brim lacy and sheer hats, the same topping ravishing flowery or plain dimy frocks.

We haven't had anything so flattering for years as these picture hats of openwork straws and other transparencies, and the adorable gay prints with which they are worn. Knowing this, women are loath to give them up until the very last moment, even though alluring fall fantasies in the way of cunning little velvet berets, likewise those of crocheted chenille are already making a strenuous bid for favor.

At the present moment interest centers about huge airy black hats with colorful frocks, although pure white and pastel colorings all have their place in the realm of summer chapeaux. In fact, two interesting trends are observed in the style panorama of the immediate moment—the all-white costume from tip to toe versus the bright frock topped with a black hat of wide proportions. It is indeed very new to wear with the gown of white georgette, net, batiste or organdie a fragile looking all-white hat whose brim is draped with subtle grace. A cluster of white violets at the shoulder and the picture is complete.

In picture below, each of the black summery models boasts a touch of color, as do so many of the late Paris

Pink with black, white with black or pale blue with black, is very Parisian. Which accounts for the delicate pink rose on the first large hat of lacelike straw in the picture, also the cluster of white violets posed at the left of the crown in the quaint bonnet of wiry crin weave shown at the top to the right.

A bit of a bouquet of lilies of the valley adorns the bandeau of the huge black hat in the center.

Community Building

Home Owning More Than Real Estate Investing

There is much more in owning a home than simply owning a piece of property. This fact was stressed by Samuel C. Kane, president of the Philadelphia Real Estate board.

"A home owner becomes a valuable and important citizen and a great asset to his city and his family the moment he acquires a home," he said. "It is only natural that there should be greater interest in a property when it is owned by its occupant than would be the case if it was only rented. The property is usually maintained in a first-class condition and it is improved to aid to its attractiveness and its convenience. If there was no other profit accruing from home ownership than the feeling of security which it affords, the latter furnishes ample reason for home ownership.

"In most sections of the country there is less reason for a person of responsibility and determination to overlook owning a home today than ever before. Any one familiar with the present market knows that homes are more reasonably priced today than has been the case in many years. The variety of homes that are available is exceptionally large and the locations are varied. In fact, there is existing the opportunity for selection, good location and fair price that should have strong appeal to any one thinking or desirous of owning a home."

Walks and Driveways of Highest Importance

There is nothing that lends more to the appearance of the surroundings of a home than neat, artistically placed walks and driveways.

Careful thought given to their arrangement at the time they are built will more than repay the owner in the attractiveness that they will add. Every lawn offers a variety of possibilities for artistic designs.

Like streets and highways, walks and driveways must be designed to meet the need of those who use them. While it is generally desirable to have them take the most direct route, pleasing effects can be obtained by the use of graceful curves. It is therefore folly to destroy a fine tree because it happens to be in line with the route of the walk or driveway; a graceful curve around the tree does not inconvenience anyone, and it will add to the beauty of home surroundings.

Often such curves can be arranged so that the garage is partially hidden behind a clump of trees or bushes.

Standardizing Evils

It is a common sight in residential sections of our cities to see unsightly rows of houses of the type which are built by the mile and sold by the foot.

They are identical in design, planning and setting. If careful attention had been given to the fundamental principles of good planning and designing, these same dwellings could have been built with far more pleasing results and at no greater expense.

Those who build small houses become responsible not only for creating the desire to build attractively and economically but also for preserving the ideals which lead people to build beautiful homes with loving hands and eager hearts.

Small Changes Mean Much

As a general thing, houses need only a few changes, here and there, to bring their exteriors up to date or to render their interiors modern and attractive.

For instance, a new entrance with modern hardware; conversion of an old porch into a sun room; installation of dormer windows in the upper story; addition of a new type roof; new hardwood or composition floors; modern heating system; new plumbing equipment; interior decoration of all rooms and painting of all wood trim, will any one of them, produce great improvement and a big difference in the home picture.

White Houses Effective

For the house set deep among surrounding foliage, pure white offers the most effective color treatment. The play of shadow-speckled sunlight upon the white background of such a house always has made one of the most exquisite pictures of man's habitation.

Naturally, the permanence of the white paint is important, for much of its beauty and value is lost if the paint "yellows" or "grays." A white house is effectively dressed with a green roof with a brighter shade of the same color used on the shutters.

Modernization Not Costly

Usually a house can be modernized for less than the amount a family could pay if it were pressed to the limit. Every family wants to spend its money so that it "goes the furthest," and the exact amount to be spent on a home can be determined wisely only by carefully checking over the family's needs and its expenses.

Beauty in Screened Terrace

Have you still got that "old front porch"? Ever consider the added beauty to your house—and comfort to your family by removing it and building a screened terrace overlooking the garden?

SIX SHOTS AND NO "BAG" FOR HUNTER

The latest tale of hunter's luck, or, rather, lack of it, is that a deer hunter from Holyoke ensconsed himself comfertably in the corner of a fence near the King place in Montgomery. After waiting about half an hour, he observed a fine buck slowly coming along the path toward him. He waited until the animal was six rods away and shot at him.

The deer was somewhat puzzled by the sound and turned his broadside to the hunter, who shot a second time, missing the deer completely. The buck immediately vanished and the hunter, cursing his luck, sat still.

A few minutes later a large doe came on the track of the buck, and stood in the same spot. The hunter took the now customary two shots, missed both times, and the doe went on.

An hour later he went to a small brook nearby for a drink and on rising from the ground saw a second buck facing him. Two shots had become a habit of his and he took them, missing both times.

He returned to the Paper city, and it is wagered he did not boast of the wonders of nature and of how beautiful animal life is.—Springfield Union.

Good Opinion of World Not Coveted by G. B. S.

An American journalist had been interviewing George Bernard Shaw and was amazed to find him, contrary to expectations, very friendly and affable.

"Tell me," he asked, "how it came about that so sympathetic and human a man as you are, has achieved the sinister reputation of being unapproachable and always disposed to snub the vast community of your admirers?"

"For heaven's sake!" laughed Shaw. "Don't talk to me about my reputation. You see, it's this way. So long as people don't know me personally, they insist that I must be a horrid old man. Then, once they have met me, they insist that I'm a much nicer old man than I really am—and there's nothing I can do about it."

Fish Freeze to Death

That fish were frozen to death in the North sea during the spell of Arctic weather in February, 1930, has just been disclosed. Fishermen who trawl there noted many strange happenings in an area of about 10,000 miles in the vicinity of Denmark. They say their strangest experience was trawling up large numbers of dead fish, evidently killed by the cold. These included soles, brill, cod, conger dabs and plaice. One skipper reported having thrown overboard 1,500 pounds of dead sole in a week's voyage.

Very Bad

Senator Simmons, the political leader of North Carolina, told a story at a New Born luncheon.

"Yes," he said, "even good news is bad when it is told about that type of man. For instance, a minister said to a little boy one day:

"'Well, son, is your father working now?'

"'Yes, oh, yes, sir,' said the little boy.

"'That's good news. That's very good news indeed. How long has he been working?'

"'Two months.'

"'And what's he doing?'

"'Three months.'"

Eminence

Winston Churchill thoroughly enjoyed his trip to America. He said so himself. He even admitted that America and England are quite different and hoped they would learn to understand one another better. His one severe criticism was our frank adoration of Mammon, regarding which he said:

"In England we still declare that a man is known by the company he keeps, but in America a man is known by the companies he merges."

The Descendant

A man who used to rein in his horse so suddenly that it reared on its haunches now has a son who dashes up a street intersection at thirty-five miles an hour, depending on 4-wheel brakes and the kindly Providence that protects idiots to stop him in six feet.—Ohio State Journal.

In Parting

"What would you say if you found a man trying to be a dictator?"

"Knowing the American temperament as I do," answered Senator Sorghum, "I'd say very little. I'd simply take him by the hand, shed a transient tear, and murmur, 'Farewell!'"

A Great Help

"But, boy, you can't live on the slender income your mother makes from selling milk. Doesn't your father do anything?"

"Yes, he pours in the water."—Munich Fliegende Blaetter.

HISTORY'S MYSTERIES

Unsolved Riddles That Still Puzzle Authorities Here and Abroad

The Crime of Eugene Aram

THE murder committed by Eugene Aram—and perpetuated in Hood's ballad, "The Dream of Eugene Aram" and Bulwer Lytton's romance, "Eugene Aram"—was remarkable not only on account of the unusual attainments of the criminal who was one of the leading linguists of his time, but also because of the fact that no evidence of the murder was adduced for fourteen years after the crime was committed.

Eugene Aram was a self-taught genius. He had received only a scanty education from his parents but, by dint of the most persevering energy, he secured an excellent knowledge of mathematics and an extensive acquaintance with Latin and Greek, as well as with the Hebrew and Chaldean languages. He taught Latin and writing at a school in London and was afterwards employed as usher and assistant to Rev. Anthony Hinton at his boarding school in Middlesex.

In 1744 Aram murdered Daniel Clarke and then successfully concealed all traces of his crime until the accidental discovery of a skeleton fourteen years later led to the conclusion that a murder had been commited, in spite of the fact that it was later found that the skeleton was not that of Clarke. Aram was apprehended on suspicion, tried at York in 1759, and found guilty on evidence supported by the testimony of his own wife. Although his counsel fought the case through on every conceivable ground, after conviction, Aram admitted the justice of his sentence and endeavored to commit suicide by opening an artery in his arm with a razor. But, despite his weakened condition, he was taken to the gallows in York where he was hanged, his body being later hung in chains in the forest of Knaresborough.

During a portion of the fourteen years between the murder and its discovery Aram was employed as assistant to Mr. Hinton, who frequently observed that whenever Aram saw a worm or any other insect in the gravel walks of the garden, he carefully removed it to a secure position where it could not possibly be stepped upon. When the murder of Clarke was discovered and Aram convicted, it occurred to Mrs. Hinton that the murderer had evidently supposed that he could atone for his crime by preserving the lives of animals and that, by frequently showing mercy and tenderness to the lower forms of life, the killing of a man would either be obliterated or his guilt considerably lessened.

At length Mr. Hinton discovered that his assistant was a thief for, hearing some persons in the garden early one morning, the head master immediately investigated, but found only a sack full of potatoes which had been abandoned upon his approach. Thinking that he had a sufficient clew to detect the thief, Mr. Hinton caused the sack and its contents to be exhibited in the neighborhood, and one of the villagers claimed the sack as his own, stating that he had loaned it to Aram, who boarded at his house. On this information Aram was dismissed, particularly as an examination of his locker at the school disclosed evidence of many petty thefts which had been going on over a long period of time.

In conducting his own defense during his trial for murder, Aram made a skillful attack on the fallability of circumstantial evidence in general and the conclusions to be drawn from the discovery of human bones in particular, quoting several instances where bones had been found in caves and attempting to prove that the skeleton in St. Robert's cave was probably that of some hermit who had taken up his abode there.

There appears to be little doubt that Aram murdered Clarke, for he practically admitted it, yet no less an authority than Bulwer Lytton was of the opinion that he was guilty only of robbery. Aram was convicted principally on the evidence of his wife, who appears to have been a most peculiar person, for, after the execution of her husband, she not only continued to live at Knaresborough but visited the forest every day and picked up the bones as they dropped, one by one, from her husband's body, while the children assisted in her support by taking strangers to view the tree where their father's remains had been hung.

Light-Fingered Fair Sex

Eating luncheon at a hotel coffee shop we were stunned when the waitress, at the end of the meal, deposited in front of us a cute little standing-up cigarette case, containing a dozen cigarettes or so.

"Those are pretty valuable souvenirs to leave around," we said. "Don't you have to put a chain on them?"

"Oh, no," replied the waitress brightly. "We just use our eyes."

"Do you have much trouble?"

"Not with the men," instantly. "The ladies," in a confidential whisper, "is what takes most of them."—Kansas City Star.

THREE SPECIAL DAYS AT THE WINONA LAKE BIBLE CONFERENCE, AUGUST 15-24

In the midst of one of the greatest programs ever offered by a Bible Conference are three great days, each with a special feature. While the program will run thru each day with numerous other speakers of note, on the first Sunday, August 17th, and the following Thursday, August 21st, and the last Sunday, August 24th, three of the world's outstanding platform men are to speak.

On the first Sunday, August 15th, Clinton N. Howard, known as "the little giant," will speak on "The Glory of the American Constitution." This is an address which more than one noted American has declared to be the strongest thing ever delivered on the question of the 18th Amendment and the Constitution. On Thursday, August 21st, is what is known as "Home Coming Day," when friends of the "old days," friends of recent days, and the Winona enthusiasts from everywhere are expected to be at Winona in great numbers. Lionel Fletcher, Australia's outstanding evangelist, and at present pasttor of one of her largest churches, will speak on the subject, "A True Detective Story." Immediately at the close of this service an old fashioned lawn party will be held on the lawn under the giant oaks, with a number of speakers and reminiscences from old timers.

On the last Sunday, August 24, Dr. O. F. Bartholow, will be the speaker. He comes from the great Methodist Church of Mount Vernon, New York. His great men's Bible class is the largest in the United States. He is a mighty preacher and will speak on the subject "The Philosopher's Stone."

These services will be held in the Billy Sunday Tabernacle, seating 7000 people, and if the experience of last year is duplicated the huge building will be packed to its capacity.

For detals of the Winona Lake Bible Conference write to Dr. W. E. Biederwolf, Director, Winona Lake, Indiana.

LADIES AID ENTERTAINED AT COUNTRY HOME

The Ladies Aid of the Church of Christ met Thursday, in an all day meeting, at the pleasant rural home of Mr. and Mrs. Reuben Koch. Twenty members, six guests and eight children did ample justice to the bounteous potluck dinner. The collection for the day amounted to $6.20.

A short business meeting was held in the afternoon and the following program was given:

Song, "All Hail the Power of Jesus Name."
Scripture Lesson, I Corinthians, II chapter, Mrs. Belle Woodcox.
Prayer, ...Mrs. Della Johnson.
Song, ..."Count Your Blessings."
Reading, ...Mrs. H. R. Ruple.
Short Play, "Who Told the Lie?"
Mesdames Woodcox, Pugsley, Meek.
Reading .....Mrs. Belle Woodcox.
Duologue, Mrs. H. R. Ruple and Lena Meek.

Games and foot races furnished the further amusement of the day. Ask Mrs. Katie Storer or Lena Meek about the races.

Pollution of Waters

The extremely dry and warm weather of the past few weeks brought forth many reports of pollution of waters. Recent investigations have been made by this department of the following: Babb's creek and Little Laughrey creek, Batesville; White river at Columbus; Muscatatuck river below Austin and at Little York; Pony creek at North Manchester; Black creek at Van Buren; White river at Martinsville; Wild Cat creek near Frankfort; a spring stream at Richmond; Pleasant Run at Greenwood; Lake Michigan in the Calumet region; Wolf Lake at Hammond; White Water river at Brookville; Big Blue river at Carthage; Blue river at Edinburg. It is probable that the recommendation in some cases will be for prosecution, and in others for an endeavor to induce installation of adequate waste treatment.

State Lakes Stocked With Fish

The lake recently constructed by the Division in Shakamak State Park was stocked this month with 4365 bluegills 2 to 6 inches long, 2310 crappie, 3 to 8 inches long, and 99 large-mouth bass 7 to 18 inches long. The artificial lake in the Brown County State Game Reserve was stocked with 2850 bluegills 2 to 6 inches long, 500 crappies 3 to 8 inches long, and 14 large-mouth bass 7 to 14 inches long. These fish were procured from reservoirs of the City of Bloomington, which courtesy of the city is hereby acknowledged. For the present no fishing will be allowed in these lakes. The Division plans to make a scientific biological study of the development of the waters.

Kankekee Game Preserve

Dr. Howard Enders, of Purdue University, is now engaged in making a preliminary survey of this preserve for the Dvision, to determine the possibility of turning water into the old irver beds and into the dry bed of English Lake. If this could be accomplished it would create waters and marshes suitable for feeding, nesting, and resting of wild waterfowl.

Warden Service

In the month of June the wardens and hatchery men made 275 arrests and procured 246 convictions. Thirty cases are pending, and two defendants were acquitted. The fines and costs amounted to $5,582.60. Among the offenses were 106 for hunting, fishing or trapping without license, 69 for use or possession of spears, nets or traps, 21 for possession of undersize fish, and 8 for dynamiting fish.

YOU WOULDN'T BUY A CAR WITHOUT A Top

Somebody has said that the automobile buyer of twenty-five years ago was lucky if the price he paid included the steering wheel. Tops and many other features that are standard equipment now were accessories then. Even engine performance is taken for granted today. ¶ That's partly because Shell Motor Oil has helped make the automobile amazingly dependable. Shell Motor Oil has constantly anticipated lubrication requirements. It is ready now for the cars that will be announced next year. ¶ Because of Shell's low-temperature refining of Nature's best balanced crude, Shell Motor Oil is never scorched, never weakened before it reaches you. Naturally, regular users experience long, trouble-free motor life. Have you tried it?—It's as modern as tomorrow.

VOL. XLIV | ST. JOE, DeKALB COUNTY, INDIANA, THURSDAY, AUGUST 14, 1930 | NUMBER 33

A MISSOURI EDITOR AND HARD CIDER

A Missouri editor, who was brimful of hard cider, got a wedding notice and a public sale mixed, and served to his readers this dope:

William Smith, the only son of Mr. and Mrs. Josiah Smith, was disposed of at auction Lucy Anderson on my farm one mile east of here, in the presence of seventy guests, including the following towit: Two mules, 12 head of cattle. The Rev. Jackson tied the nuptial, the last weighing 1250 lb. on the hoof. The beautiful home of the bride was tastefully decorated with a seewash calf, a spade, a sulky rake, one feed grinder one set of double harness almost new, and just before the wedding ceremony was performed Mendelsshon's wedding march was played by one milch cow. to be fresh next April, carrying a bunch of flowers in her hand and looking charming in a gown made of light spring wagon, two boxes of apples, two racks of hay, one grinder stone, mouseline dress trimmed with about 180 bushels of spuds. The groom is a well known and popular young man, and has always stood well among society circles of 12 Berkshire hogs, while the bride is the accomplished and talented teacher of a splendid drove of Poland China pedigrees if desired. Among the beautiful presents were two sets of knives and forks, one spring wagon, one wheel barrel, one go-cart and other articles too numerous to mention.

EXTREME CAUTION URGED BY MARSHAL

Alfred Hogston, State Fire Marshal, has issued the following warning to citizens:

"An unusual condition confronts the people of Indiana. We are enduring the most terrible drought and extreme heat in many years. This creates a very serious fire hazard. We call upon all campers, motorists, hunters and householders to exercise extreme caution in every way to avoid starting or spreading fires. Any fire may easily prove numanageable under existing conditions. We wish to call especial attention to the danger of discarding burning cigars and cigarettes, as well as refuse fires, camp fires and the like.

"The law is very clear on the case of one who wantonly creates a hazardous condition, and this office intends to take cognizance of such situations. We believe that the criminal laws of the state are broad enough to include those who without any regard for the rights of others or without paying any attention to present conditions wantonly and with gross negligence start fires that spread and do great damage. The very wantonness and negligence of the act at this time, in our opinion, implies a malice and intent upon which a criminal action may be brought, and it is our intention to look into these matters and bring guilty parties to justice."

EIGHTY SECHLER RELATIVES GATHER

The fortieth annual reunion of the Sechler family was held at the home of Henry Sechler in Butler, Sunday, August 10th. The forenoon was spent in visiting and at noon a bounteous dinner was served to which all did justice. In the afternoon a fine program was rendered after which ice cream was served.

Eighty relatives responded to roll call with ten guests in attendance. Officers for the coming year were elected as follows:

Pres., Susan Sechler.
Vice Pres., Byron Widney.
Secretary, Grace Curie.
Treasurer, Sam Mumaw.

The next reunion to be held at the home of Susan Sechler of St. Joe.

THE LITTLE RED SCHOOL HOUSE

It is becoming more and more the custom for people on their summer vacations to go back for a brief visit at least, to the homes of their childhood. Perhaps that is because automobiles and motor highways make it easier to do that than it used to be; perhaps it is because city folks are beginning to realize that the country towns they came from are changing and that soon the old landmarks will be gone, swallowed up by the relentless maw of Progress.

One of the vanishing landmarks is the old fashioned country school. The old school house—is one of the places nearly all of us like to look up to when we go "back home." The memories of childhood cluster more thickly about it than any other structure except the old homestead itself. The church was a place to which we were dragged rather reluctantly. Not that we were always enthusiastic about going to school, but at least the school as a democracy of our own kind. Except for the teacher, who was only one against many, we children had things pretty much our own way. We were among those of our own kind, who thought the same thoughts, spoke the same language, looked on the world from the same perspective.

Somehow the old fashioned country school seems, in perspective, closer akin to the pioneer spirit which is the spirit of America, than any modern structure with its graded classrooms, steam heat, electric light and other modern ideas, but, like the ox-team and the covered wagon, it is disappearing.

GARAGE-IMPLEMENT PARTNERSHIP DISSOLVED

MORE PAVED ROADS IN DEKALB COUNTY

Commissioners Approve Plans for Hardsurfacing of Waterloo-Hamilton and St. Joe-Spencerville Highways

The reports and the plans and specifications for the paving of the Waterloo-Hamilton road and the St. Joe-Spencerville road were approved by the county commissioners Wednesday before adjourning the August session.

The plans for the Waterloo-Hamilton road call for bituminous retread top on the south section, a distance of 12,300 feet, and concrete on the north section, a distance of 9,470 feet. The cost is estimated by County Surveyor Charles T. Miser, at $67,927, including $3,800 for incidentals.

County Auditor Estell Dawson was directed to give legal notice of a meeting of the county council for the purpose of passing upon the public utility of the road. If the council approves the project the commissioners will proceed to let the contract and issue bonds. Mr. Dawson announces that the council will consider the project at its annual session Sept. 3rd.

The entire length of the St. Joe-Spencerville road, 5.2 miles, is to be constructed of concrete, according to the report. The estimated cost is $135,135.16, including $4,500 for incidentals. The project was continued for a supplemental report. Tihs will be filed within ten days and the county council will probably give the road consideration Sept. 3.

No objections being filed, the assessments for the Solomon Shank drain were confirmed by the commissioners and the drain was established. Jacob Varner was appointed superintendent, with $2,000 bond.

The applications of Fred H. Bergstedt and Virginia Lee Ginther for the county scholarships to Purdue university were granted, as was the application of E. A. Eakright for admission to the Irene Byron sanatorium.

LOCAL ITEM

Grace Curie has been spending the past two weeks with her sister Mrs. Perry Jump c, Woodburn.

Any item of news will be welcomed by the editor and you owe it to the home town paper to give it such matter as will interest its readers.

The Harlan M. P. Sunday School held its annual picnic Tuesday in the Erick grove, and a fine time was had by all. About 90 were present for dinner and others came in the afternoon. A number from St. Joe were present.

Dr. J. B. Current, Federal Vetrinary Inspector, called at the office of the county agent, E. E. Stinson, on Monday and stated that he was starting to test cattle in the county for tuberculosis. Those who are especially interested in getting their cattle tested should file their desire for test in the county agent's office.

We guarantee to satisfy you when we accept your order for printing.

TWO ZEIGLER FARMS SOLD AT AUCTION THURSDAY

Two farms owned by Mr. and Mrs. Alonzo Zeigler of Auburn, were sold at public auction Thursday by Ralph Drake, an auctioneer of Montpelier, Ohio. The land was formerly the estate of the late Mrs. Eunice Zeigler of Auburn.

The tract of eighty acres southeast of Auburn which was without improvements was sold to Clarence Berry, who resides nearby, for $2,400.

The farm of 206 acres southwest of Auburn was purchased by Charles F. Ross & Son of Garrett, for $5,150.

Over 100 people attended the sale and there were a number of bidders. All crops are reserved and possession will be given as soon as they are harvested. Terms of the sale were 50 per cent cash and the balance in two equal annual payments.

BARN AND LIVESTOCK BURN FRIDAY

Charles Lawson living 2½ miles north-west of Concord, suffered a heavy loss Friday morning during the downpour of rain between 7 and 8 o'clock when his large, practically new barn burned down after being struck by lightning.

The barn, which was built two years ago and was covered with a metal hip roof was completely destroyed, together with a mule and a horse, a lot of machinery, hay and some grain.

Mr. and Mrs. Lawson were not at home when their barn burned. They left Thursday night to visit in Ohio and their daughter was left at the farm.

The value of the barn was approximately $1,800. Mr. Lawson carried insurance in the DeKalb Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Co., amounting to $1,400 on the barn, $300 on the contents and $500 on livestock.

HART

Mrs. Myra Hart, 71, died at the residence, 1103 Columbia avenue, Fort Wayne, Tuesday morning at 2:15 o'clock. Surviving are the husband, William Hart; one daughter, Madge Hart; two sisters, Mrs. Ida Blodgett, Columbus, O.; Mrs. E. J. Grill, Auburn; two brothers, Emmet Nelson, Hicksville, O., and Delbert Nelson, Auburn. Services will be held Thursday afternoon, 2 o'clock, daylight saving time, at the residence. Burial will be at St. Joe. The deceased was a member of the Pythian Sisters and Women's Benefit association.

For years Mrs. Hart was a resident of St. Joe, living where John Wineland now lives. Her many friends here will be sad to learn of her death.

F. R. Kinsey will have charge of the funeral.

HISTORY'S MYSTERIES

Unsolved Riddles That Still Puzzle Authorities Here and Abroad

The Secret of the Misericordia

BEYOND doubt the most mysterious brotherhood in the world is that of the "Misericordia," the strange fraternity which has its headquarters in Florence, Italy.

The origin of the Misericordia dates back to the Thirteenth century during the time when one of the deadly plagues was scourging Europe. Thousands died in every city and the bodies of the dead were left where they had fallen lest the living contract the dread disease. Even the sick were shunned, being left without the slightest care or comfort, and it was then that the workingmen of Florence, prompted by a humane desire to be of as much assistance as possible, organized themselves into a brotherhood of mercy to nurse the sick and to give Christian burial to the dead.

After the plague had run its course the secret society was still held together, but gradually dropped some of its high ideals until even today the mention of the name of the brotherhood is likely to bring a shudder and a quick glance of apprehension in almost any city in Italy.

From the very conception of the organization a considerable amount of secrecy was maintained in order that all classes might be brought into a bond for the good of humanity and, from the richest to the poorest, a cordial invitation was extended to enter the Misericordia, the members of which wore the all-concealing gown and mask which they still affect. In addition, not only were the "Brothers of Mercy" unknown to the public at large, but they were ignorant of the names of the other members of their organization, for they never conversed when on duty or while wearing the insignia of their order and the affairs of the body were conducted with such secrecy that even brothers might belong without one ever knowing that the other was a member.

A secret council governs the entire membership and this council alone knows the names which appear upon the roster of the order, assigning the different members to their duties. The headquarters of the Misericordia is in the Piazza del Duomo at Florence and in this building each brother keeps a secret locker which contains his gown and masked hood. A signal is used to summon the members to duty and, when this is given, they are under oath to drop whatever they may be doing, present themselves at a previously designated meeting place, don their disguises and receive the commands of the council. Some may be called upon to carry the sick or wounded to the hospital, others to assist in the nursing of a case of contagious disease and still others may be assigned to certain duties which the council may consider to be in the interest of humanity at large, though they are hardly connected with the safety of the individual.

At the mysterious call the nobleman leaves his palace, the artisan drops his tools, the peasant quits his humble home and, upon terms of perfect equality and in entire ignorance of the identity of those with whom they are working, they proceed to the meeting place, there to receive the orders of their leader, the supreme council.

It is no unusual sight in Florence to see gowned and masked persons hurrying along the street in the performance of their duties and the inhabitants of the city have grown so used to the sight that they make no effort to pierce the mystery which surrounds the identity of the individual, nor to discover the mission on which he has been dispatched. When summoned at the death of some distinguished brother, the Misericordia turn out in a body. They may be seen not infrequently carrying the remains of their dead comrade on a bier, while other members of the secret organization proceed and follow with lighted torches while dirgelike music adds to the solemnity of the occasion.

The visitor to Florence may be curious as to the identity of the men whose individuality is concealed beneath the flowing robes and masking hoods, but the natives have learned to regard them without curiosity and have almost ceased to speculate upon the mystery which lies behind the centuries-old secret of the Misericordia.

Pretty High Explosive

Mr. and Mrs. Bust were very pleased with the new twins. Many and furious had been the arguments over the naming of the little darlings. But at last they had agreed, and now they were at the church for the christening ceremony.

Mother was holding the little girl, while father had the boy.

The clergyman turned to the mother.

"Well, Mrs. Bust—what are the little girl's Christian names to be?"

"Florence May."

"And how about the little boy?"

"John Will."—London Answers.

Lesson for August 17

SAUL, A MAN OF GREAT POSSIBILITIES WHO FAILED

LESSON TEXT—I Samuel 9:15-17, 25-27; 10:1; 13:9-11; 31:1-4.

GOLDEN TEXT—Wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.

PRIMARY TOPIC—A King That Disobeyed.

JUNIOR TOPIC—A King Who Failed.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—How to Avoid Failure.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—How to Profit from Failure.

The sad failure of Saul should be a warning to every young man. Few men in history had greater advantages.

I. Saul's Advantages.

1. A worthy inheritance (9:1).

His father was "a mighty man of power." One's inheritance is a strong factor in determining his success or failure in life.

2. His natural gifts (9:2).

He was a "choice young man."

(1) He was humble (10:22).

When facing the responsibility of national leadership, he hid himself.

(2) He was considerate of his father (9:5).

Not being successful in the mission committed unto him by his father and thinking that his father would be concerned about him, he proposed to go back.

(3) The grace of God was upon him (10:5-7).

God visited him with his grace to enable him to see the divine choice.

(4) The Holy Spirit came upon him (10:10).

Acceptable service can be rendered only in the energy of the Holy Spirit.

(5) He was zealous for God (11:4-15).

As the leader of his people, he performed service because of his zeal for God.

3. The friendship of Samuel (15:35).

So strong was Samuel's attachment for Saul that he greatly mourned his death.

II. Saul Made King (I Sam. 8-10).

1. The demand of the people (8:1-22).

The reason for this demand was threefold:

(1) Samuel was incapacitated by old age (v. 5).

(2) His sons were unfaithful (v. 5).

Samuel, though a good man, greatly blundered in the appointment of his sons as judges of Israel.

(3) Desire to be like other nations (v. 5).

The surrounding nations had strong leaders as rulers. Therefore, it was but natural that the Israelites should desire such leadership. Samuel protested against their action and took the matter to the Lord in prayer. The Lord directed him to point out to the people the meaning of their action.

2. Saul chosen to be king (9:1-11).

While Saul was on an errand for his father Samuel found him and anointed him. (I Sam. 10:1-16). In due time the divine choice was confirmed by the people at Mizpeh.

3. Saul displays leadership (I Sam. 11).

He displayed his military genius in effecting a great victory at Jabez over the Ammonites.

III. Saul's Failure (ch. 15).

1. The command to Saul (vv. 1-3).

He was commanded utterly to destroy the Amalekites. The reason assigned was their evil treatment of Israel after they came out of Egypt. (Ex. 17:8; Deut. 25:17).

2. Saul's disobedience (vv. 4-9).

The command was only partially carried out. Agag, the king, was spared and the best of the goods appropriated.

3. Saul rejected by God (vv. 10-25).

(1) Samuel cried to God (v. 11).

The news of this disgraceful affair greatly disturbed Samuel, moving him to pray to God day and night.

(2) Saul's hypocritical pretense (vv. 13, 16).

This pretense carried a lie upon its face.

(3) Samuel rehearses before Saul God's dealing with him (vv. 17-23).

God is more concerned with having his commands obeyed than he is to have sacrifices offered unto him.

IV. The Divine Judgment Falls (15:26-35).

1. The loss of his kingdom.

For the presumptuous offering of sacrifice the dynasty passed from Saul's house.

2. Under control of the evil spirit (19:9-11).

When allegiance to God is refused Satan takes control.

3. His shameful death (31:1-4).

Samuel forsook him, leaving him alone to suffer in disgrace.

What Mortal Man Can Do

But what can mortal man do to secure his own salvation? Mortal man can do just what God bids him do. He can repent and believe. He can arise and follow Christ as Matthew did.—W. Gladden.

The Star

Like the star that shines afar, without haste, and without rest, let each man wheel with steady sway round the tasks that rule the day and do his best.—Goethe.

THE STORY

Renewing a childhood attachment, Ernestine Briceland, of a wealthy family, is attracted by Will Todd, newspaper artist, son of a carpenter. They lunch together and recall their school days. Ernestine's sister, Lillian, knowing their father would disapprove, urges her to end the affair, but Ernestine refuses. The love-making progresses rapidly. They make a runaway marriage. Briceland is furious, but helpless, as Ernestine is of age. Loring Hamilton, lawyer, wins Lillian's consent to be his wife. Will and Ernestine begin their married life in a single room in a humble neighborhood.

Will was at the door, grinning at them, his mobile mouth twisted into a kind of sardonic look that he wore at times, and that made him like his father. He had a great deal of poise, Ernestine often thought, considering his youth and scanty advantages. Marriage had changed him very little. He was, perhaps, somewhat more inflammable, but he took Ernestine and the life with her most naturally and without self-consciousness.

They went on to Pastano's, entered an unmarked doorway and climbed broad wooden steps with double doors at the top which opened upon light, music, heat and the sound of happy voices.

The big room was airy, its excellent ventilation a surprise to Ernestine, and an important factor in every one's pleasure and good appetite. Mr. Poole came to meet them, and Ernestine gave him her hand and her nicest schoolgirl smile. She wished Mrs. Bennett had not said anything to her about this man. She did not have to heed any warnings except those her husband gave her!

Following Mr. Poole among the tables, Ernestine thought about the many things Will had told her of this man, until she felt that she knew him perfectly. His remarkable gifts, his value to his paper, his carelessness of himself, his small vanities and prejudices, his indolence and drunkenness and his great charm, she knew. He was as natural and straightforward with every one as a child with other children. Yet he possessed also the authority and autocratic manner of the man of established reputation. He drew Ernestine's hand within the curve of his arm, and led her to a table reserved for their party.

All the places were filled except theirs, and the men rose to greet Ernestine. There was only one other woman, Mrs. Wiston, the wife of the syndicate editor of the Sun, a small beautiful woman with the face of a siren who can never forget her role. She had been married twice before she had met Wiston, and Ernestine knew that back in New England were the wife and child Wiston had set aside for her. Ernestine was conscious of the indignation common to married women against such an imposter.

Wiston himself, a tall academic man with a ribbon to his glasses, Ernestine had met at the office, and John Tucker, called Tommy by every one, who was Will's rival for honors in the art room. The third man who was presented to her Ernestine did not know and she failed to catch his name. He was a small powerful looking individual, with a dark mustache, bright gray eyes and a vain and elaborate manner. The other two men, Underwood and Harrison, were from the Sun staff, and happy to be at any party, any time, any place.

They all sat down, Mr. Poole with one of the women on either side, and Tommy Tucker next to Ernestine, the pompous little man next to Mrs. Wiston, with the others grouped about the big table. Ernestine by now had forgotten her self-consciousness and became radiantly happy. She wished Will were beside her. She was only a half, and Will was the other half, and he ought always to be beside her, breathing as she breathed, turning as she turned. The idea delighted her, and she laughed at herself but felt still a deep joy in their unity.

Mr. Poole turned to Ernestine and told her softly that her youth and beauty were sweeter than sweet night itself. He took his glass in his hand.

"And more intoxicating," he said, "than this for which I have wasted half my life and most of my talents."

Ernestine, looking up in his kind face, knew instantly that in spite of his flowery words, and in spite of Mrs. Bennett's conventional fears, this great man had no predatory impulses toward her. He knew that she was deeply in love with Will. But to watch her, to speak to her, to listen to her voice, gave him pleasure. It was all he would ever want of her. Her instinct in this matter proved true, during the years of Will's association with Mr. Poole.

"And what have you two young pieces of impudence been doing since last I saw you?"

"We have dined in state at mamma's," said Ernestine, smiling mischievously. "Will missed the significance of it entirely. Papa has, under duress, forgiven him. He offered Will a job in his office."

"And what does Will say?"

"He didn't even pay any attention to it. He just said that he was satisfied with the job he had, thanks just the same, and went on talking to mamma."

Mr. Poole laughed with delight. "Doesn't he know what papa wants?"

"I don't know whether he does or not. But anyhow, papa knows that, now he has decided to forgive Will, Will doesn't intend to let it make any difference. Papa really would like to let us struggle along. He feels pretty disappointed in me. But mamma can't bear it. She is determined to take care of us, whether we will or no."

"But how can she, if Will does not change his employment?"

Ernestine's face grew firm. "She can't. I won't let her. I've made up my mind to have nothing but what Will can give me. I don't mind being poor."

"You must resist poverty," Mr. Poole said. "It is the deadly enemy of marriage."

Ernestine's small face was scornful. Poverty was not so black as it was painted, she observed. He looked at her.

"You do not believe me? Wait, then, and see."

"But we are poor now. It's fun to be poor."

"You—poor!" His amazement was so genuine that Ernestine looked at him in surprise. "My darling child," he reasoned with her, "you don't know what the word means. You two—still in the flush of first love, without children, without a house to burden you, without a responsibility! One bed will do for both of you, one room will hold two hearts together. You are well, you are eager, you are fed and clothed and housed. You have a trunk full of pretty clothes, an adoring mamma begging to do things for you. You do not know the cold and odious breath of poverty at all. I could show you its dark face: slums, little children with great heads and emaciated bodies, houses held together by strings—shambles! I'll show you pale girls, and prostitution, and bare shelves, and empty cupboards, and pride bent double. Lack is a cruel witch. Pray that you may never know her."

"Yet you just told me to wait!"

"Ah, but that was nonsense. Life will never be cruel to you."

They ate the excellent food put before them, and talked, the men arguing among themselves about a technicality in some one's work, Will and Underwood and Mr. Wiston deep in it, Mr. Poole and Tommy competing for Ernestine's attention. Presently Tommy was drawn into the men's talk, and Mr. Poole leaned close to Ernestine and became very confidential.

"Will tells me you are going to have a child. I think that is the last perfection. I always knew that he was gifted, but his marriage with you has established the certainty of his future. Such things are not accidents. He is the chosen of the gods, or one of their finest gifts would not be his. He has all the elements of success. And a wife and children will do the forging."

Ernestine's cheeks burned. She could not understand how Will could have told his still precious secret to Mr. Poole. But she exercised great self-command to be quiet and responsive to him. He went on praising Will, and assuring her of the brightness of his future, until, after a little, she forgot her confusion and told him her own feelings about Will.

The party grew very gay, and Ernestine joined in the general happiness. Without warning the tight little man with the powerful shoulders was on his feet. He bowed to Ernestine, and he bowed around the room, and everywhere hands began to clap and there were shouts of joyous approval at sight of him.

With a gesture indescribably complacent, he held up his hand for silence and got it instantly. Standing so, his chest pushed out like a pouter pigeon's, his body rocking back on his heels, his napkin in his hand, which he flourished from time to time, he began to sing.

It was Siegfried's cry of joy, when he passed through the flames and found the sleeping Brunhilde. Ernestine recognized it, as she recognized the man. He was Mostane, one of the world's greatest tenors. And she had criticized his manner! But now, all else was swept away, and she lived only through her ears, on which fell each perfect note. She knew in delightful anticipation what his golden voice would do next, and her heart soared with his voice.

He stopped abruptly, rocked a moment on his heels and then gently, softly, poignantly he sang without accompaniment:

Still wie die Nacht
Tief wie das Meer
Sei deine Liebe sein.

The tears rained down Ernestine's cheeks. He sat down in a storm of excited applause. Ernestine could not stop crying. She leaned on Will's shoulder, for he came and sat beside her and put his arm about her. When at last she could breathe steadily she rose and went around the table to Mostane and took his fat face in her two hands and kissed him.

There was a cheer from all the tables, and Will gleamed at her with approval for her spontaneity.

"Nothing else was adequate," declared Mr. Poole.

The hours passed in a trance. The patronage in the dining room changed, grew noisier, more turbulent. Girls came and went on the stage, and danced and sang, and twinkled pretty feet, and flicked bare knees. It was all an unreal blending of sight and sound and color, and Ernestine's heart was far away, in some lonely space with Will. Her being still trembled with that last swelling note. Dimly in her mind she felt an awakening of artistic comprehension, a spiritual understanding of the strength and power of perfect performance. Will had latent in him some such force, but it was far from impulses to such finished authority. Her thought was not that clear, but groping.

It was time to go home, and Ernestine wanted Will to take her away from the others. But she saw that Mr. Poole was not himself at all any longer. Will always took him home, from the office, from such affairs as this, to his flat. Ernestine felt that she could not bear to be parted from Will tonight.

She became conscious of a man standing behind her, a little to one side, regarding her gravely, quietly. She glanced up at him but did not know him. He was a huge man, with a great dark head and clear dark skin. He wore a sack suit, and his narrow tie glittered with a ruby of enormous size, set in a gold circle. On one of his big brown hands, which were covered with coarse black hair, was another such gem. Ernestine remembered with a feeling of faintness all the wild stories she had heard about Pastane's place being so disorderly. Will, at least, was sober, as he always was.

Mr. Poole now saw the stranger, greeted him and called him to the table.

"And this is Mrs. Todd, my young friend's wife. You know Will, of course, and the others. Ernestine, this is Ruby Pastano, jewel merchant, ward boss, and the owner of this dive. A bad man—a terrible man. Shake hands with him."

Mr. Poole was enjoying himself and looked up at Pastano with glee. Mr. Pastano did not smile. He still fixed on Ernestine that queer solemn look. He bowed above her.

"Sit down, Ruby, sit down!" commanded Mr. Poole thickly, and motioned for a waiter to bring a chair, which was produced instantly.

Mr. Pastano sat down between Mr. Poole and Ernestine, and she felt his gravity spreading about the table, so that all were a little quieted.

"This is my birthday," Ernestine explained graciously. "I am twenty-one years old today, and Mr. Poole was kind enough to have a party for me. Now that you have come, it is more charming."

"Your voice—" he said, his own tone soft and silky. "Where are you born?"

She told him, naively, the address of her mother's house.

Odd Beliefs Take Hold of Salt-Water Sailors

Sailors and superstition have always been closely allied writes Stanley Paul in Pearson's Weekly. Sailors attribute many virtues even to the saltiness of sea water. In Brittany the fisherfolk believe that the best treatment for a cold in the head is to drink a glass of sea water in the morning and evening. In various parts of the world sea water is much used as a lotion in cases of local inflammation, stiffness of the joints, and spine disease. Many old sailors still maintain that the sound of the waves foretells certain events. Thus, on the coast of Cork, when the waves are producing an extraordinary roaring noise it is taken as predicting the death of a great man. There are still apparently sailors who believe in modern Jonahs—that a tempest is due to the presence on board ship of some one who has something on his conscience. The story is told of a Russian captain who quite recently went to sea without paying his debts. A terrible gale arose, and the vessel got into such difficulties that the captain saw no other way out than that of throwing the box containing his cash into the sea. It nearly broke his heart as he dropped his every penny over the side, but the storm abated almost immediately.

Arizona's Famous Desert

The Painted desert lies along the Colorado river in Arizona. It is remarkable for the bright red, brown, blue, purple, yellow and white of the sandstones, shales and clays. It is the famous petrified forest of Mesozoic time.

PAJAMAS IN CHILDHOOD'S REALM; BERET FOR FALL GAINS CLASS

IF THERE'S one place more than another where pajama costumes seem to fit into their environment becomingly, that place is in the children's realm. Bless their dear hearts, how cunning they look flitting about in their little trouser and blouse outfits, and with what enthusiasm designers are creating pajama styles for wee folks. There are as many kinds of pajama styles for fashionable youngsters as there are for grownups ranging from lounging to beach types. for children from seven to fourteen are far outselling nightgowns.

Berets for Fall.

That the beret will be outstanding for fall is already an established fact, but there are berets and berets, and the beret which aspires to style prestige during the coming season must prove its "class" through distinctive styling. Likewise the material of which it is made must be assuring as to quality and novelty.

The favor accorded white acces-

ATTRACTIVE AND PRACTICAL SUIT

For the making of juvenile pajama costumes shantung is proving a most adaptable material. It has so many arguments in its favor, first among which is the fact of its perfect laundering qualities. Then too the lovely colors of shantung fit charmingly into the happy scenes of the Lilliputian world.

Shantung in a delightfully cool-looking light green was the choice of the designer who styled the attractive and very practical suit illustrated. Borderings of white shantung make a pretty trimming. A unique feature is the group of tucks down the front, the blouse buttoning at the shoulders. The pockets are adequate to store the trinkets which children take such joy in carrying about with them during play hours. The neckline is finished very prettily with a narrow scarf which is tied in a soft bow over one shoulder.

In all children's style displays nowadays particular attention is called to pajama fashions. Just now the chief attraction is beach pajamas and overalls. A pert little model for beach wear boasts an Eton jacket. The material for this cunning outfit has a red background with huge pink, blue, black and white polka dots floating over its surface like so many toy balloons. The jacket is sleeveless, worn over a sleeveless white dimity blouse. The trousers are very full and finish at the waistline with a picturesque troubadour sash.

Overalls are frequently made of gay as gay can be prints. These are for the most part trimmed with a solid color. It is said that pajama suits

SOME BERETS FOR FALL

Designers are especially making a feature of shirred velvet. Note the stunning beret illustration in the lower left corner. It is of velvet shirred in a manner typical of the new trend. White feather brushes tipped with black add their quota of smartness.

The center hat is crocheted of chenille. It intermingles black and white in a tweed effect. Emphasis is also placed on the chenille beret color matched to the costume with which it is worn.

The group pictured concludes with a formal beret suitable for evening wear. It is made of glittering black cellophane with a band and a bow of narrow white velvet ribbon.

Progress in Forestry Making Rapid Strides

A quarter of a century has brought an extraordinary change in the forestry-policies of the government, marking notable progress in conservation, says World's Work. In 1905, when the forest service was created, there were 60 reserves, with an area of 50,000,000 acres. The area today is 160,000,000 acres, embraced in 150 national forests.

The physical development of the forests has progressed continuously in the last 25 years. In 1905 there were no fire towers or lookout stations; today 831 are maintained. As many as 1,186 public camp grounds have been improved during the period. Since 1907 the mileage of national forest roads has been extended from 330 to 16,730. Forest trails have increased from 5,644 to 47,175 miles. Mileage of telephone lines built for fire protection and administration purposes has increased from 539 to 35,926.

Receipts of the forest reserves in 1905 amounted to $85,000, all for timber sold. Receipts last year totaled $6,299,802. Of this amount more than $4,000,000 came from the sale of timber cut under forest service supervision on a sustained or continuous "crop" basis.

New Berry Resists Drought

Fruit growers are interested in a wild variety of black raspberry which was found in the Oregon woods. It thrived during a hot, dry season when domestic kinds languished, did not die down in winter and even produced berries in the late fall.

It is believed the specimen is a hybrid of the black raspberry with some species of blackberry. Its leaves and growing habits are much the same as those of the latter. Experts are examining the fruit to determine if it is suited to commercial shipping and canning.—Popular Mechanics Magazine.

Pope's Title Changed

The pope's title has been changed according to the last issue of the Vatican directory. Formerly, in addition to the numerous titles, the Roman pontiff bore the title "Sovereign of the Temporal Domains of the Holy Roman Church," referring to the papal territories taken from the Holy See by the Italian government. Now the temporal title is simply "Sovereign of the State of Vatican City."

ANNOUNCEMENT

To the Readers of the St. Joe News:

For the past several years The News has been conducted as an independent paper. While it has been independent in politics, it has at all times taken a stand for the best interest of the community. The editor of The News believes that there is now a field for a political paper in St. Joe. After abstaining from political controversies and remaining neutral, we have had a chance to glean what is for the best interest of the county as well as the readers of this paper.

With that in view, with this issue The News will be issued as a Republican paper. By this we do not mean to be one sided, but will take a stand through the columns of this paper for the best things that may be of interest to the readers of this paper. We believe in the best for all, and we make this declaration. Our Democratic friends and readers will be accorded the same fairness and courteous treatment as in the past. We want them to read The News and we believe that they will be fully interested in what we may have to say in the future.

The Editor.

"To be great is to be misunderstood."

Folks never understand the folks they hate.

The best things carried to excess are wrong.

To be small is to be understood—no one has the least bit of trouble in finding it out.

You'll never miss the water till the well goes dry. You'll never miss the band concerts till the band goes by.

Keep a frog around the house. When you get enough you will see two frogs. Then you will know that you have violated the 18th.

If you want to know what kind of a man your neighbor is ask some woman in the community. They seem to be in a natural position to know.

The man who is best able to give advice concerning how a man should live or how he should interpret the bible, must necessarily be a man that has patches on the knees of his trousers instead of the seat. Patches have never been prominent in determining qualities and prestige of advisors in matters of religions and morals and even in this case it would depend where the patches were if they would be considered a badge of honor. What a man can say about the bible as a subject depends on how much he has studied it and what kind of a fellow he was when he was reading it. The interpretation of the book depends on the character of the reader. If he has something to hide his interpretation will be how he can defend himself. If he is a man of no guil' or deceit, he will interpretate the book according to what he owes to its author and his fellow man. As a man thinks so is he and as a man thinks so does he read, interpretate and preach.

Ignorance of the world's greatest stumbling block. Ignorance makes people silly, narrow, disagreeable, blind, irrevarent, incapable creators of divisions among men. Ignorance is the greatest enemy to self. Ignorance forbids a man to think correctly and makes foolish the argument that men should read to be able to think. Ignorance allows the body to grow old in the adult and keeps the mind back in the state of child mindedness. Ignorance makes light of the "weightier matters of the law" and makes the simple understandable things of life obscurant and vague. It makes mountains out of mole hills and makes a man strain at a gnat and swallow a camel. Ignorance bites the hand that feeds it and demonstrates why a drum makes so much noise. Ignorance causes the kettle to call the pot black and is born of gristle instead of protoplasm. If ignorance is bliss, so was Job's boils.

Water Isn't Free—In Places

In Brown and Jackson counties in the southern part of the state, water is being sold for 5 a glass or 50 for enough to fill a radiator of an automobile. Armed men stand over the well still giving water and other quantities are being shipped from Louisville. Live stock was sold by the farmers and all unnecessary animals have been disposed of to lighten the burden of caring for them. Leaves of trees have turned brown as they do in the fall. This year is unusual for a good many things.

Who Wouldn't Be Crazy?

Frank Brown, a supposed wanderer and pennyless recluse, was taken up by sheriff Huffman after being judged insane. On his person was found $17,000 which he probably inherited recently, owing to the fact that it was found that he had not paid taxes in recent years. Whatever might be the reason for the poor man's insanity, it is fair to assume that the sudden acquiring of the money was too much for him. Seventeen thousand dollars would make anybody crazy who was real sure that he had it. But you don't hear of anybody going goofy over being suddenly able to collect what they have got coming from the other fellow. Being in debt is what makes most of us feel natural—perfectly natural.

Mob Violence and Why

The nearest anything comes to us the more understandable and simple it becomes to understand and explain. For years past the northern reading public has been reading about the lynchings that have occurred repeatedly in the south where the foreign and negro population is greater. These incidents have been read and dismissed from the mind in a casual way, believing that these lynchings have been perpetrated by race hatred and the desire of the white race to domineer over the colored race. The northern people put such incidents in the catagory of the unusual, unprevetable incidents of ordinary life and thought nothing much about it. But since the Marion riot, in which the unpleasantness of the lynching ordeal was brought nearer to the northerner, we have begun to think that there is something deeper behind the mob law spirit that animates men to killing contrary to law.

Some men say, in trying to analyze the psychology of the mob mind, that the reason is pure hatred. Others say that race antagonism caused by industrial competition is the bottom cause. The differences of color, education, habits, and bodily appetites from the white race comes in as basic reasons by educators on behaviorism—in short the differences in the standards of living between the two races. These, and many others might be cited as reasons for the mob violence that is growing in this country.

All the reasons above might be true in a measure for mob savagry but the main reasons for the malady seem to be prompted by two surface causes, one more easily remedied than the other.

First, the lack of faith of the American people in courts of justice, to judiciously and speedily execute justice to those who need it—the lack of faith of the people in the profession of law and lawyers to execute justice rather than multiply and foster crime that would give to the law professors a greater field of financial revenue. The American people are as a matter of fact fed up on bogus justice and fake court procedure and without a doubt the reason for the tearing down of jails and the stretching of necks on the ends of ropes is the taking of the law of justice in their hands where they know penalty will be administered. When innocent children, women and men who have done no misdemeanor of any kind are made subject to the appetites of the rough neck element of either the white or black race or any old race, without the proper protection of law enforcement and judicial departments of government, it is then that the sense of justice born in the lives of every human being fares forth against injustice and criminality. The mob tears down the jail because they have been led to believe that the jails are built and used for protection of the crook instead of for punishment—a protected boarding house for the crooks. The mob has disrespect for the courts of the country because they believe that law and lawyers are financially dedicated to the protection of crooks instead of the conviction. Justice does not make an allowance for the practice of the tricks of any trade where the suffering of humanity is the result. And the mob spirit is the answer to that belief. As much as the killing or hanging of a fugitive of justice by a mob might appear as being contrary to the teachings of christianity and modern jurisprudence, as much as the practice of mob law and the evil effect the practice might have on the nation in the future in law enforcement etc., it is plain to be seen that the practice will continue to grow as long as politics, money, bunk religious beliefs are allowed to tamper with justice in any of its phases.

Second, the lack of education, forced education, education that is compulsory to every foreign boy or girl in the United States and the lack of religious education of the element needing it are said to be the leading causes of juvenile delinquency and criminal tendencies of the young. It is true that the government can educate children as cheap as it can convict one in court and feed him behind bars for the rest of his life, not counting in the cost that crime costs the innocent bystander. Its another fact that the churches of the country could teach out a lot of this criminal tendencies out of the lives of the go-wrong element of the land if they could agree long enough to stop competing with each other long enough to do a little common good, or live up to the calling of the church. If all the time and money that is spent in making churches different through competition, were spent in making churches a-l-i-k-e and Christ l-i-k-e the criminal element of the country couldn't help but get some good out of it even if he never came in contact with the church directly. But the cost and the bother of education in either the state or secular schools of the country has caused men to take a fatalistic and discouraged view of life and drove them to enlist any kind of methods to insure justice and protection to society because of the negligence of those in authority in religion, education, law and order.

Of course a white editor, being white in skin and white in principal, would naturally stand up for the white race in all questions in times of controversy. But there comes a time in the lives of white skinned thinkers when they believe that the preferences given to the white race, in times when justice is being parceled out, is some what over done. Some members of the white race bank on their prominence as white intellectuals and commit deeds knowing that they will be able to get by because of who they are and because their money stands for protection. But color is like beauty, its only skin deep. The only difference that a thoughtful person can see between a colored and a white crook or a house to house canvasser of any description, is that the colored people are black on the outside while the white people are black on the inside. It isn't the color of a man's hide or his money that ought to count but the color of his religion. Not red, not blue, not black, but white. A white man ought to live up to his color.

Facts For Farm Folks

Written by Agricultural Authorities

PROF. P. G. RILEY

THE MARKET OUTLOOK

Shall I keep the usual number of layers this winter? A few facts presented in the July 24th report of the U. S. Department of Agriculture report on poultry conditions should help answer this question.

1. There are the same number of chicks and young chickens of this year's hatch on hand as of July 1, 1930, as there were on July 1, 1929. The extra chicks produced by the hatcheries this spring were in replacement of farm hatching rather than being actual increases.

2. The number of hens on farms July 1st this year is practically the same as a year ago, but marketing of hens is heavier than a year ago. Probably fewer pullets will be saved this year than a year ago. This means fewer hens on farms this fall than last.

3. Egg production for July was decidedly lower than July, 1929, and the heat was responsible for a larger number of poor quality eggs. Prices of storage eggs incrased 2c per dozen during July for fall delivery.

4. On account of the large surplus of eggs in cold storage seasonal increases in price of eggs can be expected this fall, but prices are not likely to be as high as last fall.

5. Prices after January 1, 1931 can be expected to increase considerably over the first half of 1930.

6. Following a year of low prices flocks are usually reduced too greatly just as they are increased too greatly following a year of high prices.

As a suggestion, keep about the usual number of good early hatched pullets, cull the old hens closely and do a good job of feeding and caring for the birds and the poutry flock will be profitable.

Water Filtration Has Curbed Disease Spread

About 1887 it was announced by Percy Frankland and others that sand filtration removed nearly all the bacteria in water. Five years later came the outbreak of cholera in Hamburg, and a striking demonstration was afforded of protection through filtration. Hamburg and Altona, two cities on the Elbe river, both used the river as a source of water supply. Hamburg used unfiltered water; Altona filtered its supply. When cholera infection of the river water occurred, Altona escaped with only a few cases. Hamburg, on the other hand, had an enormous number.

Following the rapid advance of the science of bacteriology in the '80s and '90s, it was natural to consider the possibility of purifying drinking water by the addition of chemical disinfectants. The first systematic use of chlorine in water is credited to Houston and McGovern in England in 1904 and 1905. The present world-wide use of chlorine disinfectant of public water supplies, however, is due largely to the work of George A. Johnson, who, in 1908, used bleaching powder ("chloride of lime") for the purification of Jersey City's water supply.—New York Times.

Inventions That Would Make Deviser Wealthy

Among the 20 ways of making a million dollars, revealed by Roger W. Babson, economist, in the Forum are: (1) Pills for plants—condensed form of fertilizer, to do away with wasteful spreading. (2) A new gearless automobile which will use a rotary engine, go sidewise as well as forward and backward for convenience in parking. (3) A foolproof helicopter, to lift an airplane directly off the earth, enabling the aviator to light on city streets and building roofs. (4) Gliders for children. Boys will fly around their yards as safely as they now play in their sandpiles. (5) A light that will pierce fog, something greatly needed in the field of air navigation. (6) Talking books—that is, pages that may be fed into a machine and save the bother of reading. (7) Flexible, unbreakable and bulletproof glass. (8) Cold light, to do away with 95 per cent of electric current now wasted on resistance to create glow. (9) Mahogany lumber from native hardwood trees, by inoculating them with dyes and chemicals.

Diet of Lions

Lions in their native habits prey largely upon young antelopes, zebras, buffalos, giraffes and other vegetation-eating animals. For this reason it is often stated that the lion will not eat the flesh of carnivorous or flesh-eating creatures. The fact seems to be that lions will eat the flesh of any animal recently killed, such as animals left by hunters. Certainly lions in captivity are not particular about the kind of flesh they eat. There is also abundant proof that the king of beasts will occasionally attack and eat human beings. Dr. W. Reid Blair, in his book "In the Zoo," tells of two man-eating lions in Africa which carried off 18 men employed in building the Uganda railway.—Pathfinder Magazine.

Among Us Women
by Mrs. Ruth Stone

SILK GIRDLE REPLACES THE OLD-TIME CORSET

There is about as much resemblance between the old-time corset and modern girdle that women have adopted as there is between an armored battleship and a canoe. It is safe to predict that never again will women allow themselves to be sheathed in steel and whalebone until all natural beauty of figure is hidden and free, spontaneous movement is impossible.

The type of a girdle the 1930 woman selects depends somewhat upon her type of figure and the purposes for which she intends to wear it. The larger woman likes a fairly deep, form-fitting Hickory girdle with wide inserts of silk elastic over the sides, extended front shield and a light boning. The woman of slighter build, however, selects a narrow Hickory girdle, with small elastic inserts and little or no boning. Another style is of flower-trimmed, shirred satin ribbon in slip-on style. This type is particularly popular for sports and day-time wear. With the formal evening frock, which must be form-fitting according to fashion's revived mode, the other types are selected even by the youngest and slimmest of girls.

In either case, the new style girdles meet the approval of doctors and physical educators who recognize them as the perfect happy medium that gives enough support to abdominal muscles and yet permits perfect freedom of motion regardless of occupation.

But the girdle has another important duty to perform besides the slight molding restraint it gives the figure, and that is the task of keeping the stockings smooth and straight. For this reason, any girdle selected should have four adjustable Hickory hose supporters, of live, responsive elastic, and with supporter buckles with rubber cushions to protect the hose from holes and runs.

Many women like to wear a dainty Hickory round garter in addition to assure straight seam lines in the stockings, which are universally acknowledged to be essential to correct grooming.

The Beauty of Design and Color So Much Admired in Oriental Rugs May Now Be Had in Domestic Orientals.

Dear Beth:

You want some honest advice as to what to put on your floors? You "adore" Oriental rugs but don't think you can afford them?

Have you heard about these "domestic Orientals" they are putting out these days? If you haven't, you should "get educated." They have been becoming more and more popular each month and since they are made in this country they eliminate the import duty, and are more reasonable than the imported ones.

The one thing you want to watch out for, in choosing a domestic Oriental is the cleaning process. Send it to some one who knows how to clean Oriental rugs. If you don't, and if it is given the process accorded an ordinary domestic, the sheen—which is really the most attractive thing about an Oriental rug, aside from the beautiful colors—will be lost.

Oriental rugs from Persia, for instance, are fascinating and they are being made to meet the American demand. The designs and colors are the same as in the rugs made in the East. You don't need to think the less of your domestic Oriental rug because it is factory made. Movie inspired conceptions of nomads sitting crosslegged weaving on one masterpiece for years at a time are quite exaggerated. They have factories in Persia today, just about as unromantic and efficient as our own.

One reason why Oriental rugs, both domestic and imported, are popular is that the yarn is dyed in the skein before being woven into the rugs. This makes a more artistic pattern and more vivid colors than could be otherwise possible. Synthetic dyes are used in both types, modern science having made possible the production of manufactured coloring which is as efficient as plant dyes—and less expensive.

One thing you should be careful about: deal with a reputable firm instead of picking up a "bargain" from an itinerant peddler of doubtful origin. These wandering traders cannot be traced when you discover that your "valuable Oriental" is a cheap, flimsy rug with little or no wearing quality.

And you'd best put some sort of cushioning under your rugs. They'll be softer under foot and they will hold up much longer.

Our youngest cherub recently expressed himself by spilling a bottle of ink all over one of our rugs but a cleaner got it out, fortunately.

Fondly, Fern Eture.

Zonker's new truck put in its appearance Monday and its a fine looking truck, just as nice and artistic as will be found anywhere. C. A. Woodcox did the painting and lettering and it fully demonstrates his ability as an artist. A splendid style and arrangment of letters, together with colors.

Four hundred and nine onion growers attended the Onion Growers Jubilee on Little Turkey Lake near Hudson, Indiana on Thursday, August 7th. The growers came from as far west as Marshall County, from as far south as Muncie, a large number of growers from Ohio and a goodly number of onion growers from Michigan. The value of standardization of onions was discussed by J. E. Dickerson, Federal Inspector of vegetables for Indiana.

The following persons were entertained at the Frank Curie home Saturday evening in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Detwiler and son, of Reading, Pa.: Glen Cole and wife, Wm. Staman and wife, Hollis Dilley and wife, C. M. Blue and wife, Ralph Sechler and family, Mrs. Jennie Sechler and son, Merritt, Sam Mumaw and Marcia Wade of this place and Mr. and Mrs. Elgin Coburn of Petosky, Mich. Mrs. Detwiler is a cousin of the Sechler's. Homemade ice cream and cake were served.

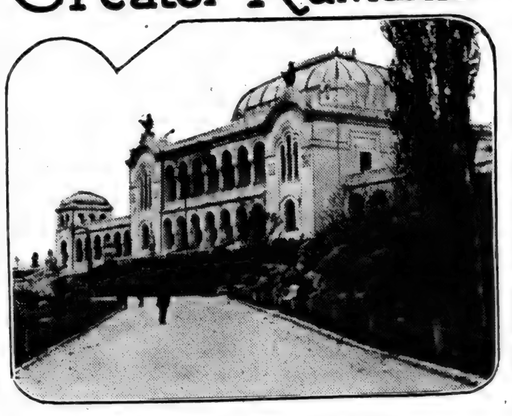
Greater Rumania



One of Bucharest's Modern Public Buildings.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

RUMANIA, the latest of the world's monarchies to change kings, has undergone such great changes in the past dozen years that it has in effect had a bloodless revolution. This period has seen the distribution of 8,500,000 acres of land to more than 1,400,000 peasants.

Before the war Rumania was a country of the landed rich and the landless poor. Today the maximum holding permitted to one individual is 1,235 acres. King and nobles gave up their estates to fulfill the demands of the agrarian reform. What Russia, Mexico and other countries have done in the matter of land distribution at the cost of many lives and much money, Rumania accomplished without a shot.

But reform was not without cost. Uncertainties, lack of organization to meet new conditions, and lack of transportation facilities increased the cost of borrowed money to 12 and 14 per cent. Credit is tight in a country where all the money in circulation must pass through the national treasury as taxes three times per year.

Greater Rumania is nearly three times as large as pre-war Rumania. The new nation took in Transylvania, the Banat, Bucovina and Bessarabia, and has yet to digest them. Old Rumania was the size of England. Greater Rumania is larger than England adding to itself Wales, Scotland and Ireland. Like the units of Great Britain, each is different; Bessarabia is an extension of the Russian black earth prairie; Bucovina, a forested region; Transylvania an upland notable for industries as well as agriculture; the Banat a lowland.

Farming Comes First.

After the war Rumania saw visions of an industrial future. The country has ample resources; oil, water power, wood, ore, and a good labor supply. Ten years have dimmed the vision but have not wiped it out. Eight out of ten Rumanians still are farmers so the nation has decided to make a good job of farming before turning to industry. Co-operatives have been organized. Groups of peasants find they can afford to buy American farm machinery. A grain grading law was passed in 1928. Silk culture starting from nothing has increased to an enterprise enlisting 4,000 workers and $18,000,000 capital.

Since the World war Rumanians have turned definitely from wheat to American corn. Greater acreage is planted in corn than wheat. Corn mush displaces bread as a national food. Bessarabia looks like Kansas. But in 1928 a second drought hit the country. The corn crop was a failure and Rumania, a country which has exported cereals for years, had to import corn. The government acted to forestall famine in some regions.

The similarity of parts of Rumania to Kansas extends to sunflowers for which both regions are famous. In Rumania sunflowers are a standard crop; 394,355 acres were planted in sunflowers last year. Oil pressed from sunflower seeds serves as a constituent of butter substitutes.

Four foundation stones support life in Rumania; cereals, oil, lumber, and live stock. Production of oil and lumber has progressed vigorously, not enough, however, to offset losses in cereals and live stock.

Companies of many nations including the United States are working Rumanian oil wells near Ploesti, northwest of Bucharest (Bucuresti). They have increased production to 4,265,194 metric tons of oil per year. Rumania stands sixth, supplying 2.4 of the world production, although Rumanian oil represents 13 per cent of the increase in world production.

Buys American Automobiles.

Despite the depression, and lack of roads, sales of automobiles, most of them American, continue to increase. In 1928 12,000 were sold—a record. Many of them go to the oil fields where they permit the engineers in charge of outlying wells to get to Ploesti occasionally for the enjoyment of companionship in the International club.

Automobiles are the biggest item of American imports which include accessories, films, oil field equipment, radios, phonographs and records, engines, insecticides and electric refrigerators to the amount of $12,000,000. Walnuts and fur skins are Rumania's chief exports to the United States.

Among the improvements to which Rumania looks forward is the reclamation of vast areas of swamp land. Seven thousand square miles of marsh will afford ample land for the remaining landless peasants, numbering about 600,000.

The nation has its own national church, the Orthodox Eastern church. Other churches have numerous members, however, among them the Unitarian church.

Bucharest (Bucuresti), capital of Rumania, has long been known as "The Little Paris of the Balkans." It has many earmarks of the French capital. One of its wide tree-lined thoroughfares is called the "Little Champs Elysee" and there is an Arc de Triomphe, both of which suggest the atmosphere of Paris. The bridle paths flanking the thoroughfare constantly resound with the thud of hoofs of blooded horses, mounted by smart looking men and women; and the seemingly endless mass of pedestrians strolls in a gay mood with no apparent destination.

Here and on other fine thoroughfares lined with palatial residences and fine church and government buildings a sad countenance is out of place. However, this portion of the city has no corner on smiles for the doorways of the humblest Bucharest homes in the cobbled byways of the poorer section of the city are filled with smiling, chattering parents while their children boisterously run here and there while playing native games. The meat vendor with whole slaughtered animals swinging on the end of a long pole, vendors of sweet meats, and even some of the multitude of beggars are a cheerful lot.

Bucharest Has Fine Shops.

Bucharest impresses the traveler from the time he emerges from one of its modern hotels downtown. Shops as fine as can be found in most capitals of the world line the business streets. Behind large plate glass windows the American traveler finds such familiar articles as American-made flashlights, radios and phonographs.

It is not necessary to find an automobile salesman to see American automobiles on display. The streets are full of them. In front of a hotel or business building six to eight of a dozen automobiles are popular American makes and across the street a billboard is plastered with an advertisement of a popular car made in Michigan. The doorways of the large movie or cinema houses display bright colored advertisements with the names of American actresses emblazoned in large letters.

Bucharest is a walled town, without the wall. Crowded, as was the custom when city walls were the main defense, Bucharest drops away from the glitter of the Calea Victoriei and the boulevards to the run-down Orientalism of the outer sections and then abruptly to the empty, dusty plain. Its population has more than doubled in the last decade and houses, as elsewhere in eastern Europe, are at a premium. It requires influence, persistence and bribery to get into one of the few hotels, the main attractions of which are the dining rooms, often open to the sky.

Surrounded as it is by rich farming country, Bucharest has not lacked for food, and the restaurants are well filled at all times. The Rumanian loves the uniform, and high heels on soft laced boots like those of the French aviators suit the fancy of the young dandies whose perfumed mustaches preserve their dignity by reaching straight out instead of turning up at the ends. The women are chic.

Some Striking Contrasts.

The few fine buildings are mixed in with unassuming structures which would never be at home in Paris or Berlin, and opposite the imposing War College Tsigane women may be working at a noisy power saw which is reducing crooked poles to firewood. The few main streets are lined with modern buildings and new residence avenues are stretching out toward the periphery of the circular city; but in the crowded center of the town the confusing litter of tiny streets and alleys reminds one of a rabbit warren.

In the market place, the traveler gets a glimpse of the rural folk who cluster about stands of vegetables which they bring to the city from the rolling farm land nearby. Here the men seem to display no particular type of costume, most of them wearing European coats and trousers and there are as many derbies as there are caps and soft hats and fez-shaped woolen head coverings. On the other hand the women folk blaze forth in bright-colored shawls which cover the head and shoulders, and aprons with stripes of a half dozen unblending colors. Their dresses are just short enough to reveal in the summer time that all feet are not shod.

The SANDMAN STORY

ABOUT THE TORTOISE

"WE ARE lucky," said Mr. Box Tortoise.

"Why?" inquired Mrs. Box Tortoise.

"Just think about it," said Mr. Box Tortoise.

"I don't know what to think about it," said Mrs. Box Tortoise. "Do you mean because we have a nice zoo home? Or because the keeper is kind to us? Because we don't have to worry about getting our food? Or because we are always safe, so very safe?"

"Now," said Mr. Box Tortoise, "you have given me many thoughts; yes, indeed, many happy thoughts. I think we're lucky in many ways, but all along I've really only been thinking of just one way. Now you have given me pleasant thoughts, and I'll show my gratitude by giving you some.

"We Can Draw Our Legs and Heads Inside Our Bony Shell.

"Well, of course you know that we live on the dry land."

"Isn't the land always dry?" asked Mrs. Box Tortoise.

"Yes," chuckled Mr. Box Tortoise, as only a box tortoise can chuckle, and as only another box tortoise can understand, "the land is always dry—that is, except when it is wet, but then it isn't lost in the wet. I meant that we didn't live in the water as so many of the turtle family do. They're our neighbors in the zoo and I love to watch their ways.

"But to continue my story why we are lucky. We can draw our legs and heads inside our bony shell, and we can also lock ourselves in."

"I know," said Mrs. Box Tortoise, "by means of a tortoise lock which is in the center of our lower shell. That is why we are named Box Tortoise."

"Yes," agreed Mr. Box Tortoise. "Of course, you knew all about it, but I wanted to remind you of it. We can always keep ourselves out of the way of danger by locking our selves in our own little boxes when we are frightened. We do it in the zoo sometimes when people come near us who are strangers."

"Ah," said Mrs. Box Tortoise, "it splendid for the Box Tortoises wi have to live in the outside world have something to keep them safe— and what a wonderful thing it is be able to carry around one's prote tion always, and to be able to put lock on it, too.

"But we never have to worry, we are in the zoo and are alway safe. Still it's nice to have our ow protection always."

Now Mrs. Gopher Tortoise was tal ing nearby. "I've heard of sensib creatures," she said to Miss Gophe Tortoise, who was her daughter, b who was called Miss Gopher, even her mother.

"You mean other gopher tortoises

"Ah, my child takes after me. S is wise. There is a compliment f you and one for me. That's what call saving time. Of course, it's n that I want to save time, but I he people speak of it as something to done. They rush and run and hurr they scramble and race and das about, and if anyone asks them wh they say they are trying to save tim and to do as much as possible in little time.

"So I paid a compliment to both us at the same time," continued M Gopher Tortoise. "I said you we wise and that was paying you a co pliment, and I said that you took aft me and therefore I paid myself compliment. Of course, now that have explained it all, I don't suppo I have really saved much time—b no matter, as I said before, it does really make any difference to me.

"Now, there are other sensible cre tures. The prairie dogs are sens ble, for they dig holes in the groun They say they love to burrow a dig better than anything! That sho they're sensible, for we're sensible a we dig holes in the sand down Sou from where we came.

"Alas, when I think of home," co tinued Mrs. Gopher Tortoise, "it mak me glad, indeed, I am in the zoo, f we are supposed to be good to e and our relatives are fast disappea ing down South—Yes, they are disa pearing down the people's throat Just because they are good to eat!

"They are big, and they have thi shells, but just the same they a caught and they are eaten.

"But our own story needn't have sad ending. We're safe."

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

THE EMPTY HEARSE

THE superstition that it is an omen of good luck to meet an empty hearse is one of anthesis, originating from the fact that it is considered an evil omen to meet a funeral procession. This idea that it bodes ill luck to meet a funeral procession is especially prevalent in the South where the negroes will frequently turn back if they see a funeral coming toward them. While this fear of meeting a funeral procession undoubtedly has its basis in the primitive conception of the "death contagion" yet there is in it certain psychological element—the idea of death coming toward one—coming to meet one. Which is shown by the fact that it is not considered a bad omen to follow a funeral procession. This notion, then, of meeting a funeral procession being a death omen, or at least an evil omen, having become firmly implanted in the superstitious world, it at once manifests itself in the superstitious mind when the owner of the mind sees a hearse coming toward him. But, lo! the hearse is empty. All that would make its approach an evil omen is wanting: death is not approaching and a mental reaction takes place which transforms the empty hearse into a good omen.

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

"SABBATH"

HERE is a word dating back to the beginning of language, to the beginning of all things; in fact, so far back that "the memory of man runneth not to the contrary."

As everybody knows, after creating the world and everything in it, including men, in six days, the Bible tells us that God rested on the seventh day. This day was called by the ancient Hebrews the Sabbath, the word "Sabbath" in Hebrew meaning to rest.

Orthodox Jews refrain strictly from any manner of labor on the Sabbath, the ancient custom being to spend the entire day in prayer and meditation.

We find the word "Sabbath" in its various modifications in almost every language and everywhere it has this meaning derived from its ancient form and usage, expressive of rest, abstention from labor and thoughts of things material, and therefore by inference if not by injunction a day for the turn of the mind to matters spiritual.

Dear Editor:

EVERY time I go to Boston I'm glad I climbed Bunker Hill monument and the big state house dome when I was young and frisky.

If I had my life to live over again I'd do more stunts like that. And read Scott and Dickens and learn duplicate bridge. Time's cheap when you're young, and it gives you something to talk about when you get up in the thirties and feel old.

But if I were starting life again I think I'd do something different with those two weeks I spent trying to learn Esperanto. And I sort of regret that afternoon I stood up to see a certain actress in a show. But I suppose we all have some time to waste.—Fred Barton.

Barbara Stanwyck

the creator of a fictional detective, but as a pioneer in the science of spiritualism."

Since his avowed communication with his son, who died in the late war, argument could weaken his faith. He approached the theory of spiritualism not as a critic, or even as a scientist, but as one who had a very real experience—an experience which gave him an unswerving faith in the truth of his convictions. The arguments he had with his friend, the late Houdini, will always be interesting especially so as the correspondence which passed between them upon this subject will shortly be given to the public.

Conan Doyle was absolutely sincere. He played no assumed role. However one may differ with him in some of his conclusions he must be given credit for his transparent sincerity. At his own request he was buried in the fragrant garden adjoining his home.

Acidity

The common cause of digestive difficulties is excess acid. Soda cannot alter this condition, and it burns the stomach. Something that will neutralize the acidity is the sensible thing to take. That is why physicians tell the public to use Phillips Milk of Magnesia.

One spoonful of this delightful preparation can neutralize many times its volume in acid. It acts instantly; relief is quick, and very apparent. All gas is dispelled; all sourness is soon gone; the whole system is sweetened. Do try this perfect anti-acid, and remember it is just as good for children, too, and pleasant for them to take.

Any drug store has the genuine, prescriptional product.

SPARK PLUGS ARE CAUSE OF FAULTS

When Worn Out or Improperly Adjusted Hard Starting Results.

Spark plugs that are worn out, improperly adjusted or dirty, cause missing of the engine, resulting in hard starting, excessive drain on the battery, poor engine performance, higher gasoline consumption, and larger engine repair expense.

All that is needed to correct such faults is to clean or re-gap the plugs; or if the car has gone some 10,000 miles with the same spark plugs, to replace them with new ones.

Limit of Mileage.

This mileage is about the limit at which engineers put the efficient life of spark plugs.

If the spark plugs need cleaning, fill the lower part of the plug with alcohol or equal parts of ammonia and water, and let stand for a few minutes. Rub the carbon from the insulator with a cloth-covered stiff wire or wooden peg. Then wipe the plug dry. Clean points with emery cloth.

The spark plugs are equipped with two electrodes set in such a manner that the electric current must jump across a small gap from one to the other. In making this jump a spark occurs. It is this spark that ignites the mixture of gasoline and air in the cylinder. The size of the gap between the electrodes affects the type of spark adjustment. The gap for use in average motors should be no wider than .025 inch. For high compression motors it should be .020 inch. At the same time the distributor contact points should be adjusted. These should be between .015 inch and .020 inch in width of gap.

Horse Power Reduced.

Tests show that a motor in which spark plugs had been used for a little over 10,000 miles developed 31.2 horse power, when run at an engine speed equivalent to 20 miles an hour. The same motor run at the same speed equipped with a new set of spark plugs gave a horse power reading of 38.0, an increase of 6.8 horse power.

The importance of inspecting the spark plugs and breaker contact points at least twice a year cannot be over emphasized as high compression engines of today impose a greater demand upon them than ever before.

Figures Are Given on Gasoline Consumption

Each motorist in the United States last year used an average of 571 gallons of gasoline per motor vehicle and paid an average of $18.36 gasoline tax, according to estimates of the American Motorists' association.

The highest per capita gasoline tax was paid by the motorist of New Mexico, paying an average of $37, based on a 5-cent-per-gallon tax, and consuming an average of 740 gallons of gasoline. The lowest was Massachusetts paying an average gasoline tax of $8 per motor vehicle, based on a 2-cent tax, using an average of 400 gallons of gasoline per motor vehicle.

Many Methods of Fixing License Fees Now Used

Sixteen different methods are used by the states to fix registration fees for passenger automobiles, and weight is used in the largest number of commonwealths, according to the research department of the American Automobile association.

Weight is the basis in 20 states, horse power in 13 states. Other methods used are: Flat rate, three states; cost of the automobile, three states; horse power and weight, five states; value, one state; flat rate and weight, two states; value in weight, one state, and cubic inch displacement, one state.

Car owners paid a total of $344,794,953 in registration and license fees in 1929, says the A. A. A., on a total of 23,542,108 passenger cars.

THE MOTOR QUIZ

(How Many Can You Answer?)

Q. What is the cause of an engine back-firing through the carburetor?

Ans. Improper valve or ignition timing, crossed or defective ignition wires, lean mixture or sticking valves.

Q. What is the cause of back-firing in the muffler?

Ans. An intermittent spark caused by improper adjustment of distributor breaker points, sticking breaker mechanics, loose or badly worn distributor brush, short-circuited wires or loose connections. Turning off the switch and coasting with the car in gear will cause gas to collect in the muffler which will often ignite when the switch is turned on.

Q. What percentage of stolen cars is recovered?

Ans. Ninety-three per cent. Seven years ago this percentage was only 74.

Q. What percentage of the 5,198,167 motor vehicles produced in the world in 1928 were made in the United States?

Ans. Eighty-three and one-half per cent.

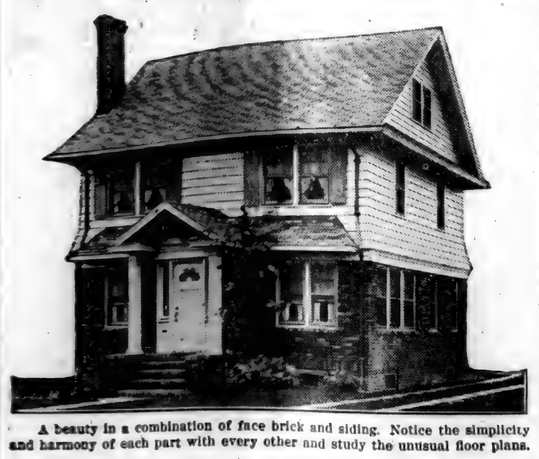
Combination of Face Brick and Siding Makes an Attractive Home

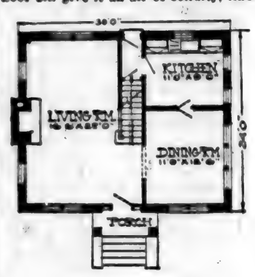


A beauty in a combination of face brick and siding. Notice the simplicity and harmony of each part with every other and study the unusual floor plans.

By W. A. RADFORD

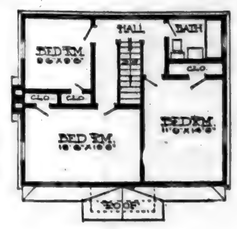
Mr. William A. Radford will answer questions and give advice FREE OF COST on all subjects pertaining to practical home building, for the readers of this paper. On account of his wide experience as editor, author and manufacturer, he is, without doubt, the highest authority on all these subjects. Address all inquiries to William A. Radford, No. 407 South Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill., and only inclose two-cent stamp for reply.

There are a great many different building materials which used alone make an attractive home. However, some people desire a combination of two materials, thereby securing an out-of-the-ordinary home. In the home building design shown in the accompanying illustration a combination of face brick and wood is used to good advantage. While the house is not large, the brick walls up to the second floor sill give it an air of solidity, likewise the contrast of the wood above helps to take this house out of the commonplace. The home is 30 feet long and 24 feet deep and contains six rooms, living room, dining room and kitchen downstairs, and three bedrooms with bath upstairs.



First Floor Plan.

As will be seen by the floor plans, which accompany the exterior view, all of these rooms are of unusual good size. The entrance door leads directly into the living room, which is 16 feet 6 inches and 22 feet long. At the right, through a double cased opening, is the dining room which is a front corner room with five windows making it a light and airy place for the family meals. Back of the dining room is the kitchen, 9 feet by 11 feet.



Second Floor Plan.

An open stairway leads out of one side of the living room to a central hall on the second floor. Off of this hall opens three bedrooms, two at the front being large, one 11 feet by 14 feet, and the other 10 feet by 10 feet 6 inches. There is a small back bedroom which is 9 feet 6 inches square. One attractive feature of this home is the roof projection at the front over both the living and dining room windows and the colonial type open porch with boxed pillars and a gable roof. The house is of frame construction and set on a concrete foundation with a single brick veneer wall below.

Paneling Need Not Be Expensive, Expert Says

Paneling, contrary to the popular impression, need be no more expensive than other methods of treating walls, says Edward W. Donaldson in "Better Homes and Gardens."

When paneling is mentioned, points out this authority, people too often think exclusively of the oak paneling of Tudor or early Stuart type of the deal or pine-paneled room of the late Seventeenth and early Eighteenth centuries; or of the ornate French paneling of sundry Eighteenth century modes. Paneling of these types is worthy of all admiration, but either adaptations or reproductions are very expensive and demand a complete environment to correspond. Without such an environment, architecture and furnishings they become absurd. There are, however, perfectly legitimate kinds of simple paneling that require neither expensive material nor highly-skilled workmanship, and such paneling can be employed in the simplest rooms with entire propriety and excellent results.

The resources available for simple paneling are wood, plaster, paint, paper, and sundry fabrics, continues the writer in "Better Homes and Gardens." For low-ceiled rooms, vertical boarding, either with matched edges or with beaded, beveled, or knotty or plain, or poplar may well be used for this purpose; the boarding may either be stained or painted and finished with wax. If people would only consent to let any kind of unpainted wood go without stain, and allow time and atmosphere to tone it, they would be repaid with delightful color, but most folks are too impatient for immediate effect. An easy type of paneling to create, and one that is comparatively inexpensive, is effected by applying wooden moldings on the plaster surface of the wall to form panels of the desired shape and size. The whole wall surface can then be painted. Again, the panels might be filled with certain types of wall paper, or with chints or cretonne of appropriate pattern, shellacked, or antiqued and shellacked. Also, certain varieties of scenic wall paper could be used in this way. Still again, the panels might be filled with Chinese or Japanese gold or silver paper.

A further possibility for panel decoration is to apply compo reliefs in the manner of the late Eighteenth century. The ground of the panel could then be painted some pale color, like pea-green or pearl-lavender, and the reliefs painted white. Yet another way of achieving inexpensive paneling is altogether through the medium of either paint or wall paper, without applying any wooden or compo moldings.

Decorative Flooring Adds to Home Beauty

Flooring is more than a mere surface to be walked on. It is a distinct decorative part of a room; it is one of the vital features in the construction of a house and, in many cases, it is a means of preventing the spread of basement fires and consequently a potential life-saver. These are but a few of the things that should be given careful consideration when the question of flooring is raised by the architect.

Wood floors are perhaps the most popular. And they may be laid in a never-ending variety of patterns. Narrow boards, wide boards or a combination of booth, blocks, or the old-fashioned planking all make attractive and durable floorings. But, again, there is more to a floor than its surface.

All floors should be laid over a subfloor and, with wood, laid diagonally to lend rigidity to the finished floor. The joists should be bridged to prevent sagging. Bridging involves the placing of wood or metal strips diagonally between the floor joists to minimize the chances of lateral movement.

Recently there have been introduced many non-wood flooring materials. Perhaps the most used of these is linoleum. An interesting pattern of linoleum is one which simulates the old plank flooring of Colonial days. Even the wooden pegs and butterflies which held the planks together are ingrained in this material.

Many finished floors are laid on a base of cement. To use this a special wire re-enforcing is needed. This re-enforcing is backed with a heavy building paper which holds the cement as it is poured; when it is hardened the criss-crossed wires impart strength. A base of this sort is particularly valuable in preventing the spread of basement fires. It will also aid in reducing fire insurance premiums.

Porch on Small Home Should Blend into Scene

Porches on the small house should be a part thereof and not the excrescences they too frequently appear. Excessive groupings of posts is considered as undesirable as are ugly, short columns. The location of the porch has much to do with the exterior appearance and the interior comfort. Porches are often built so as to shut off light and sunshine which are needed within. Form and mass are always the first points of the porch to be considered. Glassed porches, which serve a double purpose as sleeping and breakfast rooms are greatly favored by home builders.

Here's Latest Addition to "Pet Snake" Stories

For his own particular pet Alec Milne of Mount Vernon, N. H., prefers a snake, and for an excellent reason. Most people select pets for companionship or because of a fondness for a particular species. Not so with Mr. Milne; he says he likes his pet snake because it performs a good day's work and asks nothing in return. Mr. Milne is a truck farmer and is hampered in his work by a leg injury, which makes it impossible for him to reach down to remove grubs, worms and insects which destroy plants. So every morning the three-foot striped snake starts out with his master and follows him along through rows of vegetables. The snake enjoys itself immensely, removing the pests and eating them, says the Boston Globe. At the end of the day the "pet" returns to its haunts in a nearby pile of rocks to rest for the night.

Conquering Diphtheria

Modern publicity methods allied with the application on a vast scale of the latest principles of public health administration, were so effectively used against diphtheria in New York last year that the disease is expected to be extinct there within five years. Such was the purport of the first annual report of the diphtheria commission concerning its work in 1929 under Dr. Shirley Wynne, commissioner of health, which pointed out that a half century ago one out of every two contracting the disease died of it.

Restless CHILDREN

CHILDREN will fret, often for no apparent reason. But there's always Castoria! Harmless as the recipe on the wrapper; mild and bland as it tastes. But its gentle action soothes a youngster more surely than a more powerful medicine.

That's the beauty of this special children's remedy! It may be given the tiniest infant—as often as there is need. In cases of colic, diarrhea or similar disturbance, it is invaluable. A coated tongue calls for just a few drops to ward off constipation; so does any suggestion of bad breath. Whenever children don't eat well, don't rest well, or have any little upset—this pure vegetable preparation is usually all that's needed.

FEED TOWN OF 10,000 EVERY DAY IN WORLD'S BIGGEST BUILDING

Chicago Merchandise Mart, a Wholesale City Under One Roof, to Have Most Novel Restaurant in America to Cater to the Appetites of Merchant-Buyers of the World.

THE Chicago Merchandise Mart, the world's biggest business building, already one of the outstanding institutions of the midwestern metropolis, will house the world's biggest restaurant, with an international menu and accommodations to feed daily a whole town's population of diners. It is estimated that it will be able to dispense food to 10,000 a day, according to Andrew C. Weisburg, nationally known hotel man, who has secured the exclusive restaurant rights in this new central market under a twenty-year lease. The official opening of the mammoth restaurant will take place in early September.

More than 30,000 square feet of space in the Mart's grand lobby will be utilized by the restaurant's five units. There will be many unique features of equipment and service and a roster of more than 500 employees. To take care of this vast army of eaters from all parts of the world, it will require daily 500 pounds of butter, about 3,000 pounds of meat, 3,000 pounds of potatoes, 300 dozen eggs, 750 dozen rolls and 250 fowl. In addition to this will be enormous quantities of vegetables and fruits, which it is difficult to estimate.

Need Huge Quantities of Food

On one side of the great 650-foot grand lobby will be the men's grill, accommodating 200 at a time; and the main dining room for men and women, to be called the Governors' room, with a capacity of 600 at a time. Opposite these will be a lunch counter about 1,000 feet long, the biggest in the world, which can care for the needs of at least 5,000 a day, and a soda fountain capable of serving 2,200 a day. These will be grouped about a huge kitchen, which, according to Mr. Weisburg, will be the most modern in equipment and service yet put into operation in this country. A woman's grill and tea room to accommodate 450 people will be located on the mezzanine floor. Outside of these five units, a special service for tenants in their offices and display rooms will be provided that will enable them to order from any one of the five restaurants. Liveried employees will deliver the orders on electric wagons at any time of the day.

The men's grill and the main dining room will be most colorful in their decorations. The equipment for all the units will be of the most modern type, cleanliness and convenience being the paramount points of consideration. The metal used in the construction of the equipment will be of special silvery finish, specially rolled at the mills for this installation. Not a single bolt or rivet will be visible, thus insuring a clean, even surface easily cleaned. For the kitchen, all equipment, such as refrigerators, ranges and broilers, are to be set on special bases. The refrigerators will represent the best construction that modern refrigeration engineering can produce. Temperatures will be automatically controlled without the aid of human hand.

Employees Specially Trained.

The bakery, which will be operated by electricity, is to be a model of efficiency and cleanliness and is flooded with daylight through a series of large windows having a southern exposure. The lunch counters will be built entirely of marble in a series of "U" shapes, with cold foods easily accessible from center serving cases so that within ten or fifteen minutes one may be served a complete meal and ready to leave. The chairs at the counters will have comfortable full backs and sufficiently far apart to prevent crowding. The soda fountain will be 100 feet long and will be electrically refrigerated to keep the ice creams, sirups and other foods for light lunches in perfect condition. Fifty-six thousand dollars' worth of silver has been purchased so that the patron at the lunch counter will have the same service in this regard as in the grills or main dining room.

For the men's grill and the main dining room, men waiters will be used, but in all the other units the feminine hand will care for the patrons. Henry C. Gordon, general manager, who is famed as a kindly but firm disciplinarian, said that one of the first features to be established will be a school for employees. This school will be different from the average business school, Mr. Gordon not only wants through this means to improve the service of the restaurants, but he also seeks to improve the employees. He teaches thrift and building character. The ideas of the employees as to how the restaurants should be run are welcomed.

Tours World for Ideas

Mr. Weisburg, who also owns the Hotel Oliver at South Bend, Ind., and the new Harrison being constructed in Chicago, recently made a tour of the world in quest of new ideas for the Merchandise Mart restaurant.

For instance, the merchant arriving at the Mart goes directly to the special accommodation desk in the restaurant, leaves his hand baggage, is assigned his room, and is free to proceed about his business. His day's task completed, he then goes to the Harrison hotel, Chicago's newest popular priced hostelry with rates at $2.50 and $3.00 for room with bath and circulating ice water, to find his baggage in his room and the room itself ready for his use. It has been estimated that this novel arrangement will save the merchant-buyer at least one hour's time in addition to taxi expense.

One of the world's most famous chefs, Pierre J. Berard, employed at a salary of $10,000 a year, will supervise the menus in this restaurant.

Pierre is a student and psychologist, who started in life as a sculptor and architect, but who found cooking his forte. He is not only an artist in food chemistry but in line and color as well. He is skilled in fashioning graceful forms as well as in seasoning and flavoring. It is his contention that a chef must appeal to the eye as well as the palate. He has been chef at the Ritz and Berkley hotels, London; the Maurice, in Paris, and in many of the big hostelries in America, including the Ritz-Carlton and New Yorker in New York City. Paul Poiret, the noted fashion expert of Paris, pronounces Pierre the "greatest cook in the world." Pierre is famous as a creator of rare dishes and says he hopes to enable diners to understand what they are eating without a knowledge of French. He is planning to tell on the menu just what those high-sounding names bring you when you place an order.

"Buyers from all parts of the United States and foreign countries will come to this great central market," said Mr. Weisburg. "Merchants from the big cities and the small communities will be among the thousands who will visit this gigantic structure every day. There will be every conceivable kind of appetite to cater to, so we will have an international menu. With the five units of the restaurant we also will be able to have a price range that will meet the pocketbooks of all classes."

To Be Buying Capital of U. S.

The Mart itself, which houses more than six hundred of the outstanding manufacturers, wholesalers and importers, is destined to become the new buying capital of the United States if not the world.

The purpose of the Mart is to bring a great community of mercantile leaders to present the latest ideas, patterns, styles, designs and colors in merchandise, developed by the world's foremost manufacturers. More than 85 per cent of the 4,000,000 square feet of display space has been leased and buyers from all parts of the country are beginning to come to this new central market.

"The Mart embodies the modern idea of a concentrated market, of bringing the buyer to market instead of attempting by means of sample cases, traveling salesmen and trunks to inadequately take the market to the merchant," said Claude A. Welles, general manager of the Mart. "The arrangement of the display floors has been scientifically worked out with the object of conserving the buyer's time and energy to the utmost, providing every necessary aid to expedite his examination of goods and for his convenience while in the market.

27 Miles of Corridors

"The buyer can enter the Mart in the morning, attend to all his business and personal affairs during the day, and do practically all his buying without leaving the shelter of one roof until bedtime. This is a Department Store for Stores—a concentration of related lines under one roof. It will effect a revolution in distribution, will reduce the time necessary for the merchant's buying and correspondingly increase his time for selling."

Each of the eighteen display floors has sales corridors 650 feet long, a display space of around five acres, veritable business boulevards. Bordering on these are hundreds of lines of merchandise visible through 27 miles of windows. This great space, a total of 100 acres in the entire building, makes it possible to house the selling and display activities of the many allied concerns on a single floor with related groups on adjoining floors. It is estimated that $500,000,000 will be the total annual sales in the Mart.

HISTORY'S MYSTERIES

Unsolved Riddles That Still Puzzle Authorities Here and Abroad

The Secret of the Misericordia

BEYOND doubt the most mysterious brotherhood in the world is that of the "Misericordia," the strange fraternity which has its headquarters in Florence, Italy.

The origin of the Misericordia dates back to the Thirteenth century during the time when one of the deadly plagues was scourging Europe. Thousands died in every city and the bodies of the dead were left where they had fallen lest the living contract the dread disease. Even the sick were shunned, being left without the slightest care or comfort, and it was then that the workingmen of Florence, prompted by a humane desire to be of as much assistance as possible, organized themselves into a brotherhood of mercy to nurse the sick and to give Christian burial to the dead.

After the plague had run its course the secret society was still held together, but gradually dropped some of its high ideals until even today the mention of the name of the brotherhood is likely to bring a shudder and a quick glance of apprehension in almost any city in Italy.

From the very conception of the organization a considerable amount of secrecy was maintained in order that all classes might be brought into a bond for the good of humanity and, from the richest to the poorest, a cordial invitation was extended to enter the Misericordia, the members of which wore the all-concealing gown and mask which they still affect. In addition, not only were the "Brothers of Mercy" unknown to the public at large, but they were ignorant of the names of the other members of their organization, for they never conversed when on duty or while wearing the insignia of their order and the affairs of the body were conducted with such secrecy that even brothers might belong without one ever knowing that the other was a member.

A secret council governs the entire membership and this council alone knows the names which appear upon the roster of the order, assigning the different members to their duties. The headquarters of the Misericordia is in the Piazza del Duomo at Florence and in this building each brother keeps a secret locker which contains his gown and masked hood. A signal is used to summon the members to duty and, when this is given, they are under oath to drop whatever they may be doing, present themselves at a previously designated meeting place, don their disguises and receive the commands of the council. Some may be called upon to carry the sick or wounded to the hospital, others to assist in the nursing of a case of contagious disease and still others may be assigned to certain duties which the council may consider to be in the interest of humanity at large, though they are hardly connected with the safety of the individual.

At the mysterious call the nobleman leaves his palace, the artisan drops his tools, the peasant quits his humble home and, upon terms of perfect equality and in entire ignorance of the identity of those with whom they are working, they proceed to the meeting place, there to receive the orders of their leaders, the supreme council.

It is no unusual sight in Florence to see gowned and masked persons hurrying along the street in the performance of their duties and the inhabitants of the city have grown so used to the sight that they make no effort to pierce the mystery which surrounds the identity of the individual, nor to discover the mission on which he has been dispatched. When summoned at the death of some distinguished brother, the Misericordia turn out in a body. They may be seen not infrequently carrying the remains of their dead comrade on a bier, while other members of the secret organization proceed and follow with lighted torches while dirgelike music adds to the solemnity of the occasion.

The visitor to Florence may be curious as to the identity of the men whose individuality is concealed beneath the flowing robes and masking hoods, but the natives have learned to regard them without curiosity and have almost ceased to speculate upon the mystery which lies behind the centuries-old secret of the Misericordia.

HISTORY'S MYSTERIES

Unsolved Riddles That Still Puzzle Authorities Here and Abroad

Who Killed James Maybrick?

BOTH on account of the fact that she was the daughter of a banker in Mobile, Ala., and because the death of her husband was surrounded by the most mysterious circumstances, the trial and subsequent imprisonment of Mrs. Mary Chandler Maybrick for the murder of her English husband caused a widespread sensation on both sides of the Atlantic and threatened for a while to lead to a diplomatic break between London and Washington. Mrs. Maybrick's final release in 1905 was heralded as a final confession of error on the part of British law and a vindication of the woman who had been wrongfully imprisoned for fifteen long years. But even this did not clear up the mystery connected with the death of James Maybrick.

Mary Elizabeth Chandler, who was destined to play a leading role in this tragedy of legal mistakes, married James Maybrick of Liverpool when she was eighteen years of age. During the second year of their marriage a son was born to them and, later, a daughter.

For eight years the married life of the Maybricks appeared to be as happy and pleasant as possible. Then, apparently without any explanation whatever, Maybrick developed the temper of a brute, finally beating his wife and turning her out into the street. Evidence produced at the trial, however, showed that Maybrick had become a confirmed arsenic-eater and this was understood to account for his sudden alteration in habits and disposition.

Following the brutality of her husband, Mrs. Maybrick sued for a divorce but, on account of the children, the couple were reconciled and lived together quietly for a short time. In the spring of 1889, however, Maybrick was taken ill and died a short time later, presumably from natural causes. The dead man's family, however, maintained that there had been foul play and insisted upon having the body exhumed, particularly as they announced that they had discovered no less than seventy grains of arsenic concealed in the room which Mrs. Maybrick had shared with her husband.

In spite of the fact that minute examination of the body disclosed the presence of only one-tenth of a grain of arsenic and medical authorities stated that two grains was the smallest dose which could possibly prove fatal, Mrs. Maybrick was arrested on the charge of murder and the ensuing trial was one of the most sensational in the annals of the British courts. The attorney for the defense proved conclusively that Maybrick had been in the habit of eating enough arsenic to kill a dozen men and showed that he had continually bought large quantities of this poison for his personal use. The prosecution countered with the statement that this alleged habit of the dead man was a fabrication invented for the sole purpose of explaining the arsenic found in the house after Maybrick's death and exploded a bomb-shell in the shape of evidence that Mrs. Maybrick had purchased flypaper containing arsenic which she had soaked out, stating that she intended to use this as a complexion bleach.

But, as the concluding statement of the counsel for the defense showed, Mrs. Maybrick had been the first to give the alarm when her husband had been taken ill and, as her lawyer put it, "If she had wished to set every one in the house and the doctors themselves on the scent of poison, she could not have acted differently."

Sir Fitzjames Stephen, presiding judge, delivered a long and rather rambling address to the jury which appeared, at first, to favor the defendant but which concluded with what was practically a demand for her conviction and the jury, after being out only thirty-eight minutes, returned with a verdict of "guilty as charged." Shortly afterwards the judge went mad and the Liverpool Post in commenting upon the matter said: "In fancy, one still hears the distant fanfare of the trumpets as the judges with quaint pageantry pass down the hall, and still the mind's eye sees the crimson-clad figure of the great mad judge as he sat down to try his last case. A tragedy, indeed, was played upon the bench no less than in the dock."

Having been sentenced to the gallows, Mrs. Maybrick remained in prison for seven weeks and then, after having been warned that her execution would take place within a few days, was suddenly reprieved and her sentence commuted to life imprisonment. During the years that followed an almost constant stream of diplomatic messages about the American woman passed between London and Washington, but it was not until fifteen years after she had entered prison that Mrs. Maybrick was released on a "ticket to leave"—with the mystery of what had really caused the death of her husband still unsolved.

Principal, Mrs. Nellie T. Mershon, supported in the high school by Genette Woods of Grabill, Aletha Falls, Helen Smith, and Mr. Dink, all of Fort Wayne.
Now that the school will be consolidated, with the exception of the Schmucker school, south of Leo, to be taught by Helen Snyder, all the children of the township will be brought to the consolidated school, which will be ready by October 1st and the following teachers will have charge of the grades:
Ida Spencer, Leo, grade 1.
Thelma Schlatter, Grabill, grade 2.
Mae Schwartz, Auburn, grade 3.
Bertha Akey, Perry Twp., grade 4.
Mable Trimble, Grabill, Rt. 1, grade 5.
Ruth Moss, Leo, grade 6.
Homer Deventer, Grabill, Rt. 1, grade 7.
Beulah Soule, Ft. Wayne, grade 8.
George Hollopeter will serve as Janitor. Contracts for hack drivers will be let later.

CONCERT SEASON CLOSES SATURDAY

The close of the open air band concert will be reached with next Saturday night's concert at St. Joe, which marks the termination of the ten nights contract with the St. Joe merchants.

As announced last concert night some special numbers will be rendered and a two hour program will be given for good measure and appreciation for the support given by those who backed the concerts financially for the season.

An exchange concert engagement has been arranged between the local organization and Grabill band under the leadership of J. L. Klopfenstein, when St. Joe will go to Grabill on Wednesday evening, August 27, and Grabill will return the concert on Wednesday evening September 3rd. Arrangements should be made for as many as possible to accompany the band to Grabill, and they in turn will show St. Joe what kind of folks are in business at Grabill.

DOINGS OF THE TOWN BOARD

Monday evening the board transacted its business and made its proposal for tax levy for next year, which will be found in another column.

The board was visited by a number of citizens, namely, Ed Leighty, E. R. Kinsey, F. R. Bowman and Ed Miser, asking for a tax of three mills to be placed in the budget for next year, to be used for band support, in maintaining the weekly concerts. After listening to the proposal by the gentlemen, the board passed their request and placed it in the budget, to be acted on at their next meeting of September 2nd., at which time any objections will be heard from those within the taxing unit upon the proposals made.

The assessed valuation of St. Joe has been lowered $20,000, giving a net valuation of $379,265 from which to rasie the necessary funds to maintain the city government in all its departments.

If interested in the affairs of our little town look over the proposal.

TEN MINUTES WORK —GETS TEN YEARS

Sheriff Clarence Minnick took Viril Myers, aged 18, of Fort Wayne, to Pendleton, where the youth will start a ten-year sentence for robbing the Farmers' State bank at Stroh. Myers' pal, Roy Bennett, was shot and fatally wounded by a vigilante while the youths were trying to escape from a posse near Ashley. Alvin Pratt, aged 20, is held in jail awaiting trial in the September term of court on a charge of being an accessory before the robbery. He was involved in an auto theft by Myers' confession.

GRADUATED THURSDAY FROM I. B. C.

Miss Janice Ridgway, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Derwood Ridgway, who has been attending the International Business College at Fort Wayne, was among the class of 44 graduates last Thursday. Miss Janice completed the private secretarial course.

Congressman David Hogg, addressed the class discussing the various phases of the civil service work.

CONGRESSMAN HOGG HERE

On Friday, August 29, Congressman David Hogg will be at the St. Joe postoffice to meet all those who wish to see him on official business.

Mr. Hogg is holding office days in all parts of the district during each vacation of Congress.

Street and alley fund, 30 cents on the one hundred dollars.

Band support, 3 mills on the one hundred dollars.

Head tax, $1.50.

Valuation, $379,265.

34t2 Derwood Ridgway, Clerk.

HARLAN BOYS ENGAGE IN FIST FIGHT

Saturday evening, about 9:30, at the close of the band concert, perhaps one of the most barbaric incidents took place on the street, when Lester and Boyd Smith, of Harlan, took vengence on Howard Baughman, of Spencerville, and rendered him unconscious by battering him in the face, and up until today, he continues in this same condition.

It seems that the Harlan boys had trouble with Glen Agler, of Spencerville, who was with the Baughman boy, about the Fourth of July, and they were attempting to square things, but as it happened the wrong boy is made to suffer for their grudge.

Lester Cummins, of Harlan was driving the Chevrolet Coupe, in which the trio left town suddenly when they see what they had done.

Marshal Williams ordered the car to stop, but it failing to do so, he threw his club through their windshield and cut the two Smith boys on the face and arms.

Deputy sheriff, Hanna, Hursh and Wm. Keeler proceeded to follow the car to Harlan, while another car traced them near Harlan, and when they arrived the boys were having their wounds dressed in Dr. Julian's office and were telling what had happened. The boys were ordered to remain until Allen county authorities arrived and by this time Sheriff Armstrong and his deputy arrived at Harlan.

Young Baughman was given first aid when carried into Curie's store and Dr. Fanning was called and has charge of the case, making daily calls at the Baughman home in Alen county.

Sheriff Armstrong was called and he went into the details by getting evidence from bystanders, before he went to Harlan.

The condition of the Baughman boy is serious and it is thought that charges of a serious nature will be filed against the trio.

SPENCERVILLE MEN IN ARGUMENT

Benjamin Jones of Spencerville, pleaded guilty to a charge of assault and battery Friday morning in city court before Mayor Lige of Auburn and was fined $1 and costs which amounted to $11.65. Charles Kimes, also of Spencerville, swore to the affidavit that the assault took place August 12th when the two men got into an argument over some wages which Kimes alleged were due his children from Jones.

TRYING TO FILL HOLES IN STREET

Practically every citizen has his own idea of how the holes in the street should be filled, so Tuesday morning a gang was busy filling the holes with the loose gravel that could be scraped up from the side. This was the only part of the program that they could agree upon.

After this was done the Filling Station proceeded to give the gravel an application of old lubricating oil. Ed Leighty thought Caro syrup was the thing to use in holding the gravel; Chas. Cochran thought an application of strawberry pop would be better; L. B. Meek was more determined that an application of cocoanut shampoo would prove beneficial, and J. C. Hull insisted that a treatment of "Deloney" twice a week would not only cement the holes, but would lay the dust for blocks each way as it would be distributed by the auto tires. They all had their way and when thru "Jigga" Keeler gave it all the second application of cylinder oil.

Just watch the results.

FRANK SPIRES DIES AT DOVER

Frank Spires, 51, who was stricken while handling cement for the W. L. Johnson Construction company of Hicksville at Freeport, Ohio, died at 4:30 A. M. Friday in a hospital at Dover where he underwent an operation for appendicitis ten days ago.

Mr. Spires had been a resident of Hicksville and vicinity practically all of his life, living in Newville township on the farm owned by Columbia City bank, prior to moving to Hicksville. For a few years he lived near Coburntown.

Mr. Spires is survived by his widow; three daughters, Misses Glendolyn, Lena and Esther, all of Hicksville; three brothers, John Spires, Angola, Ind.; Joseph, Farmer, and Michael, Fostoria; and five sisters, Mrs. Ivan Lantz, Mrs. Michael Huber, Mrs. George Wonderly, Mrs. Court Schooley and Mrs. Rudolph Koerner, all of near Hicksville.

HAD DINNER AT STATE PARK

Republican workers from DeKalb, Steuben and Lagrange counties had a pleasant meeting at Pokogan state park hotel last Thursday evening, where a fine dinner was served to 150 guests. Elza O. Rodgers, state chairman made a short talk, with Harry Nicholls, candidate for state treasurer, Judge Gimmell of Marion. Congressman David Hogg talked briefly on the tariff. Announcement was made for a gathering there on August 28, at which time men of national prominence will be on the program.

It Is What You Save That Counts

If a man earns $5,000 a year and spends it all, he is not as well off as the man who makes $3,000 a year and saves $500. It is what you have to show for a year's work that counts.

In a few years and time passes quickly, the $3,000 a year man will be wealthy, and all the time he is free from debt and worry.

We invite you to come into our bank and open an account.

Justices' Franking Privileges

The justices of the United States Supreme court enjoy the franking privilege when writing on official business. The clerk of the court handles most of the correspondence, and his office is supported by fees paid by litigants, and most of his correspondence is to litigants about their cases. The fees of the clerk are paid by litigants, and if the government were to grant the franking privileges on such matters it would amount to paying postage on private cases.—Washington Star.

JONATHAN AND DAVID: A NOBLE FRIENDSHIP

LESSON TEXT—I Samuel 18:1-4; 20: 14-17, 32, 34, 41, 42; II Samuel 1:17-27.

GOLDEN TEXT—A man that hath friends must show himself friendly and there is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Two True Friends.

JUNIOR TOPIC—David and Jonathan, Friends.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Finding Worthy Friends.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Friend Who Does Not Fail.

The friendship of David and Jonathan has become immortalized in the world's thought. It was unique in that it occurred between two men of rival worldly interests. Jonathan was the crown prince, heir to the throne according to hereditary rights. David was heir by divine choice and arrangement. Jonathan knew this and magnanimously waived his natural personal rights in favor of the one he knew God had chosen.

I. Friendship Established Between David and Jonathan (I Sam. 18:1-4).

1. Love at sight (vv. 1, 2).

Following the interview of Saul and David, after the victory over Goliath, Jonathan's soul was knit with that of David. He loved David as his own soul. While there was mutual love, this pleasing fruit stands out more prominently in Jonathan than in David.

2. A covenant established (vv. 3, 4).

The bringing of David into Saul's home gave opportunity for expression of love between Jonathan and David. This love resulted in the establishment of a covenant between them. Following this love covenant, Jonathan stripped himself of his court robe and his equipment and gave them to David. This act was a virtual abdication of the throne to David.

II. Jonathan Defended David Against Saul's Frenzy (I Sam. 19:1-7).

David went into the battle with Goliath out of zeal for God and true religion, not for personal glory, but it turned out as always, that because he put God first, God honored him. On David's return from victory over the Philistines, according to oriental custom, he was met by a triumphal chorus of women of all the cities of Israel, chanting praises to him for his victory over their enemy. They ascribed more praise and honor to David than to Saul. To hear sung the praises of a shepherd boy as surpassing his own was too much for Saul. It aroused murderous envy which had been slumbering in his heart and moved him to attempt twice to kill David. This is not an imaginary sin. Its counterpart may be found in many of our own hearts. The only cure for this dreadful evil is to put God first—to think more of him and our duty to him than our reputation before men. In Saul's third attempt to kill David, Jonathan defended him before his father, from whom he secured the oath that David should not be slain.

III. Jonathan Revealed to David Saul's Murderous Attempt (I Sam. 20:30-40).

The beginning of the new moon was celebrated by sacrifices and feasting at which all the members of the family were expected to be present (v. 5). David's excuse for being absent was that he might go home to attend the yearly sacrifice of his family. The annual feast was more important than the monthly feast. Matters were now so serious that Jonathan and David renewed the covenant between them. In this renewal the terms were broadened beyond the life of Jonathan (vv. 14, 15). Saul's anger was now so fierce that for Jonathan to be found in David's company was most dangerous, so he cleverly planned a sign by which he could make known to David Saul's attitude and purpose. True friendship is proven in warning those who are exposed to danger.

Concerning friendships, observe:

1. It should be made while both parties are young. This is the time when hearts are capable of being knit together.

2. Real friends are few. Great care should be exercised in the formation of friendships, for while loving everybody, it is possible to have only a few friends.

3. Both parties must be God-fearing. David and Jonathan both recognized their obligation to the Lord, and that his help was essential to the welfare of both.

IV. David Mourns for Jonathan (II Sam. 1:17-27).

When David learned of Jonathan's death he sincerely mourned, remembering his undying loyalty and his personal worth.

Love Is the Conqueror

Love alone in this world is the conqueror; by love alone can the nations of the world be brought into the paths of peace; to pursue and to attain love is to pursue the one thing needful to attain the only thing in the world.—Rt. Hon. Stanley Baldwin.

God's Presence or Absence

I think I can say, through grace, that God's presence or absence alone distinguishes places to me.—William Burns.

The KITCHEN CABINET

(©, 1930, Western Newspaper Union.)

Man is but man, inconstant still, and various:
There's no tomorrow in him like today:
Perhaps the atoms, whirling in his brain,
Make him think honestly this present hour:
The next, a swarm of base, ungrateful thoughts
May mount aloft.—Dryden.

SEASONABLE FOODS

When the green tomatoes are fully grown they may be sliced, dipped into crumbs and egg and fried as ripe ones, making a most tasty luncheon dish.

Eggs Baked in Tomatoes.—Cut off the tops and scoop out the centers of six tomatoes. Put one-half teaspoonful of butter into the cavity, then drop in a raw egg, being careful not to break the yolk. Season with salt and pepper and add another bit of butter on top. Set into gem pans to bake. Serve with a cream sauce.

Everybody likes french toast when it is well prepared. Beat two eggs slightly, add one-half teaspoonful of salt and two-thirds of a cupful of milk. Dip the slices of bread which are cut in uniform thickness into the mixture, cover well on both sides and fry on a hot griddle which is lightly greased. When brown on both sides serve hot with maple sirup or cinnamon and sugar mixed together.

As America produces a large part of the cheese made in the world, we should have a higher appreciation of its food value, as do the countries on the other side of the oceans. We serve it more as an appetizer than as one of the most nutritious foods.

There are those who like, buy and enjoy fresh cheeses that are chewy and tough when cooked. Cheese should never be cooked at a high temperature, any more than milk or eggs. There are countless most delightful dishes which have cheese for a basis, but most of such dishes when palatable are prepared from well seasoned cheese. Cheese should be kept and properly cared for for a year before it is ripe enough and of good flavor.

Banana Float.—Squeeze into tall sherbet glasses juice of half an orange, one-half teaspoonful of lemon juice and sugar to taste. Stir until dissolved. For six glasses use three oranges. Mash two ripe bananas with a silver fork, add a few drops of almond extract, one-half cupful of powdered sugar and one-half teaspoonful of vanilla; stir in lightly one and one-half cupfuls of whipped cream. Drop two generous spoonfuls of this mixture into each glass and serve very cold. Serve within a half-hour of preparing.

PICKLIN' TIME

In every family there are a few cherished recipes of good things which have been handed down through the years and which are enjoyed by each succeeding generation. Grandmother's cookies, noodles, pickles or mince meat. We outgrow our fondness for some foods that we liked when young, but the food mother prepared continues to be the favorite.

Sliced Green Tomato Pickles.—Slice a peck of firm well developed green tomatoes, also slice six good sized onions. Put a layer of the sliced tomatoes in a large dish, sprinkle with salt and add a layer of onions. Repeat until all are used. Let them stand overnight. In the morning drain, add one quart of vinegar, one cupful of brown sugar, two sticks of cinnamon, and a tablespoonful of cloves, tied in a bag. Put over the heat and cook until the tomatoes are tender but not broken. Pack into a stone jar, pour over the vinegar and when the pickles are cold add one-half cupful of grated horseradish and a tablespoonful of mustard seed. If the horseradish roots are too small to grate put them in whole. Cover with a weight and keep the jar well covered. These pickles are best when not too sweet.

Spiced, Pickled Peaches.—Take three pounds of sugar, three cupfuls of good vinegar, one ounce of cloves, two sticks of cinnamon, boil all together, then add seven pounds of ripe peaches which have been washed and the fuzz rubbed off. Cook the peaches in the spiced vinegar which has been boiled for a few minutes. Drop in a few at a time and when thoroughly scalded put into the cans. Boil the sirup down for another few minutes and pour over the peaches. These pickles may be kept in jars that are not perfectly sealed.

Tomato Catsup.—Take three dozen ripe tomatoes, three red peppers (the hot ones), six onions, all chopped fine. Add two teaspoonfuls each of cinnamon, mustard, and one of cloves all ground. To three cupfuls of vinegar add one cupful of brown sugar and three tablespoonfuls of salt. Cook all together for two hours, very slowly, then put through a sieve, reheat and bottle and seal.

THE STORY

Renewing a childhood attachment, Ernestine Briceland, of a wealthy family, is attracted by Will Todd, newspaper artist, son of a carpenter. Ernestine's sister, Lillian, knowing their father would disapprove, urges her to end the affair, but Ernestine refuses. They make a runaway marriage. Briceland is furious, but helpless, as Ernestine is of age. Loring Hamilton, lawyer, wins Lillian's consent to be his wife. Will and Ernestine begin their married life in a single room in a humble neighborhood. John Poole, Will's best friend, gives a birthday party for Ernestine at Ruby Pastano's resort.

CHAPTER IV—Continued

"But you have lived in the country?"

"Oh, yes, always, in the summer. My Grandmother Langley had a home in Indiana where my father's quarries are. Why do you ask?"

"Never mind me. Tell me of yourself. This house in the country, and your home on Sheridan road is a long way from here."

Ernestine understood his idea, but she refused to be drawn into such a complicated conversation.

"It is only a few miles," she replied, and he gave an impatient exclamation.

"It is a thousand miles and a hundred years at least," he said. "Tell me about your mother's house."

Ernestine thought about it.

"Do you know anything about American period furniture, Mr. Pastano? There is a Duncan Phyfe table, and pierced brass fire-fender, in the living room; four-poster beds upstairs, with hooked rugs and woven counterpanes—all of the things have come into the family honestly, through natural possession, and not from auction rooms. But, of course, you know."

She smiled at him. Her long hands lay together in the immaculate perfection of her yellow chiffon lap. Her voice was low, only for his ears, and though she thought him very strange, she gave him her gravest, youngest courtesy.

"I know nothing about America, at all, it seems."

"It's just the house—I'll take you to see it some day, if you like, although mamma doesn't like people to consider it a museum, as some experts do. Of course, I don't live there since my marriage. We live in a rooming house on Erie stret, and it just shows that furniture and things do not mean so much, for I am happier now than I was."

"You have lef' this house of your mother, with pierced brass from your own ancestors, to live in Erie street?"

She nodded and smiled again, and her eyes pleaded for his understanding.

He shook his head sadly. He heaved a vast sigh.

"No, I do not understand America. Continually I am full of new astonishment. Women are somewhat the same the world around—but American men are outside my comprehension."

"You have been successful here," she reminded him, but he brushed her comment aside, pursuing his own thought aloud.

"No, I do not understand. If my son is penniless; if he is an artist starving in a garret, and the great, the incredible good fortune come to him that he shall marry a girl of noble birth, who has a quiet voice, and gentle still hands, and a brow where breeding shows its lovely smile—If my son have the grace and the smile of fortune to marry such a girl, and he bring her to a place like this—" He looked about him with scorn. "If he bring his wife to this brothel—this sink—I take a knife in my own hand and stab him through the heart. You must go away from here instantly—now! There is activity in this room that pollutes the very air. You will strangle in it—"

Ernestine's heart stopped beating in her astonishment. She felt that she had been unbearably affronted, and she rose and stood pale with anger. Mr. Pastano rose and stood before her, and met with approval the blaze of her eyes. A waiter appeared instantly with her coat, and he took it and wrapped it about her with immense dignity.

"So, go, princess!" he exclaimed, and bowed a little, and looked at her again, his own eyes alight. "You have only my good wishes. It is unfortunate I must confess the title to a place unfit for you, but this place was not made for you. The unfit, the broken, the abnormal must have their haunts, and they are not for others. Some day, perhaps, it will be my fortune that we shall be friends."

Every one was staring at them. Will had risen and stood beside her, smiling uncertainly, not knowing at all what was going forward.

"I want to go home," Ernestine said to him icily

"Tommy will take you," Will answered easily, "I have to take Mr. Poole to his flat."

Ernestine felt herself beginning to tremble with the indignities heaped upon her. She had been so in love, so exposed, that it all hurt her incredibly. She looked about her uncertainly, then laughed and answered Will with composure.

"I don't believe I'll have to depend on Tommy. Here are Lillian and Loring. They'll take me home."

Will swung about in astonishment, and there, indeed, coming through the room uneasily, were Lillian and her lover. Ernestine stood, smiling malignantly, as they came forward.

"Ernestine," exclaimed Lillian, when she was near enough, "I wanted to see you. We went to Mrs. Bennett's, but the maid said you were here, so we followed you. Can you come with us?"

"I was just going," answered Ernestine. "But wait and meet our friends. This is my sister, Miss Briceland, Mrs. Wiston, and Mr. Poole, Lillian, and Monsieur Mostane, and Mr. Wiston of the Sun, and Mr. Underwood, and Mr. Heyward—and this is Mr. Pastano, who owns this charming place. And this is Mr. Hamilton, Mrs. Wiston—"

The men had risen and were fumbling over the acknowledgements of the introductions. Ernestine seemed the most composed person present, and no one could have guessed that her knees were trembling.

"We wanted to get on, if you and Will can come with us," said Loring,

"But You Have Lived in the Country?"

while Mr. Pastano stood and regarded the newcomers evenly.

"I'll come with you, but Will has an engagement before he returns home. Goodby, Mr. Poole. Thank you for the evening."

She gave her hand to her host, and he put his own hand on her shoulder to steady himself. Loring winced and scowled at this contact, but Ernestine was now in complete command of herself and smiled steadily. Mr. Poole's heavy face, his confusion, did not dismay her. She bade him an affectionate good night, then turned to the others.

"Good night, all of you. I'm sorry to run away, from my own party, but somebody must start. If you will excuse me— Good night, Will. I'll see you later."

She gave Will a luminous look. He did not answer but stared at her silently, and she turned, sweeping her wrap about her, carrying herself like a queen of the realm, and went off, Loring's black bulk between the sisters, his face dark with forebodings.

Down the wooden stairs they passed in complete silence. A new sedan stood at the curb, and Loring in majestic silence opened the car door for the girls who got in the back seat. He closed the door and got in the driver's seat and started the engine. Lillian and Ernestine sat close together in the warmth and comfort of the heated upholstered, glass-enclosed interior. Ernestine felt for the first time a poignant homesickness for comfort and convenience.

"Why didn't Will come with us?" asked Loring from the front seat.

Ernestine decided to be frank.

"You could see that Mr. Poole had been drinking too much, couldn't you? Well, Will felt that he ought to take him home and see that he got there safely. He often does that. They're good friends, you know. And you mustn't think badly of Mr. Poole. He's old, and, really, he is a wonderful man."

"But how about you? How would you have got home? Our coming along was an accident."

"Tommy Tucker would have taken me," said Ernestine calmly. "Or the Wistons, or Monsieur Mostane. I'd have gone home all right."

There was a silence of disapproval and adjustment. The car rolled smoothly along the quiet streets.

"Then everything's all right?" asked Lillian diffidently.

"Of course, darling."

"I'm so glad. Will you come and have lunch with mamma and me tomorrow and let me tell you all our plans?"

"I'll see," said Ernestine. "Now, I'll have to go home. I'm terribly tired."

"Of course you are. It's late. I'm tired, too. But, Ernestine, I'm so happy that I wonder if I can be any happier." Her voice was bright and clear—quick and competent. Ernestine remembered the tears and passion of her own engagement.

"You will be happy always. You will," she said with intensity.

They left her at the stone steps and watched until she opened the door with her latchkey and disappeared into the dark prison-like house. Then Loring turned the car about and, with Lillian at his side, started back north. Lillian cuddled against him.

"Oh, Lorrie," she said sorrowfully, "she isn't happy. You know she isn't. It wouldn't be so bad for her to be poor, if only he were good to her. But you can see that he neglects her. If he cannot provide for her decently he could at least be a gentleman to her. But after all she has done for him, he mistreats her."

"Don't be disturbed about it, darling," said Loring in a low voice. "There's nothing we can do now. Only be good to her and wait for her to waken."

In Mrs. Bennett's boarding house Ernestine climbed the stairs slowly, feeling herself weak with rage.

CHAPTER V

The First Quarrel

Ernestine's anger and resentment grew like a bonfire. The small front room was cold, but she was unaware of its temperature or of the frost gathering thick on the window. Everything was fuel to the flame which burned in her. The longer Will delayed the more her anger grew. His cavalier treatment of her. Tommy could take her home! Mr. Poole needed him. More than anything else, more, she told herself, than the humiliation of Mr. Pastano's scorn was this fact, that Mr. Poole mattered more than she did.

She gave herself up to anger as she had given herself to love—with abandon. Will had neglected her. He had humiliated her. She knew that she would not have cared for any of it so much if she had not been forced to see it through the horrified eyes of her sister and Loring. They were pitying her now. She could imagine Lillian's comments, Loring's sympathy. That was the crux of the whole matter. And Mr. Poole, the vile old drunkard! Was this the sort of friendship her marriage was to bring her? She had given up everything for Will—everything! Was he to sacrifice nothing for her? Could he not abandon this adoration of an obscene old man who happened to be a cartoonist? It was not necessary for these gifted people to foregather in such a place. She burned and trembled as she recalled Pastano's contempt. That strangers should need to instruct her as to her proper place—

So absorbing were her thoughts, so wrapped was she in the resounding cadences of her own inner tumult, that she did not hear the outer door nor Will's soft step on the stairs, when at last he came.

"Up yet?" he asked in a husky whisper. "You should have been in bed two hours ago. It's cold as the devil outside. But what's the matter, kitten? Aren't you well?"

"Don't speak to me!" said Ernestine, and the fact that, like himself, she had to lower her voice in consideration for people sleeping on either side only added to her rage.

"But Ernestine!"

"Don't speak to me!" she cried again, and this time her voice was clear. "I never want to go anywhere with you again."

"Be silent," he commanded in a voice low but stern, and his eyes leaped back at her with an anger equal to her own. "Have you lost your wits? Shouting in this place in the middle of the night?"

Ernestine stood, her mouth open a little in amazement at his tone. Hot words trembled upon her tongue.

Discoveries Put Roman Art on Higher Plane

But archeological discoveries in Italy and the Roman dominion within the last two or three decades, and the scientific comparison of Roman art with Greek and other art, and the consequent evaluation of its merits, have put Rome on a rather high plane of artistic production.

No longer is it to be believed that there was no Roman art before the time of the empire; from the fourth to the second centuries before Christ there was a large and meritorious amount of work done, both in painting and in sculpture. A fairly large piece of wall painting was found in a tomb on the Esquiline hill in Rome. It dates from the end of the fourth century B. C., and represents a group of Roman generals holding a conference.

The draughtsmanship is spirited and the massing of the figures in the background is technically superb. It happens also to be the earliest—to date—example in Rome of a superposed frieze decoration. The idea may well have been derived from Ionian models, but the departures in technique are so important and so Roman that the style was believed to be native and it became the pattern which was developed into the Roman triumphal arch relief work.—Washington Star.

A Little Advice

TRACKLESS TROLLEYS IN USE IN DETROIT

Trackless trolley service was inaugurated in Detroit, Mich., recently when the new noiseless, smokeless and electrically operated cars were put in service. The cars have accommodations for 40 passengers, can accelerate to a speed of 35 miles per hour in 30 seconds, and have a leeway of 16 feet each side of the overhead trolley line that supplies the power. They also can pull over to the curb to discharge and take on passengers.

SUDDEN STOP IS BAD ON CHASSIS

Expert Suggests That Drivers Use Their Brakes With Moderation.

How long would your present automobile last if you installed a 350 horsepower engine in the chassis and drove it wide open?

There isn't a motorist in the world who would impose such a load on an ordinary chassis, because every driver knows that no standard automobile could withstand the terrific stresses imposed by so powerful an engine.

Impose Equal Stresses.

Nevertheless, many motorists habitually impose equal stresses on their cars without realizing it, a fact brought out by a Detroit manager of a large automobile concern, in a discussion of brakes and braking.

"Few persons realize how much energy must be dissipated to stop a car," he said. "Motor-wise drivers who know that it requires tremendous horsepower to give rapid acceleration never seem to think of braking in similar terms.

"With hydraulic four-wheel brakes, a car running at any speed can be brought to a dead stop in one-fifth the time that it takes to attain that speed. A 2,000-pound car, therefore, would require an engine of 350 horsepower to accelerate to 30 miles an hour in the same time that it may be stopped when going at that speed.

"Some drivers who would not expect a standard chassis to stand up with a 350 horsepower engine make it a practice to use the brakes to their full power for every stop. That is, they maintain speed to the last possible moment even when they know long in advance that they must come to a standstill, and then bring the car to a sudden halt.

Advantage in Making Stop.

"It is a great advantage to have the ability to make sudden stops in emergencies, but it is a gross abuse of a car to use this power harshly every time.

"Drivers should use their brakes moderately for all service stops. When they see a red light a block a head they should let the car slow down gradually, bringing it to a standstill finally with gentle brake pressure.

"This practice, if followed regularly, not only saves the tires and brake linings, but guards the whole chassis from undue stresses."

Check Up Repairs After Car Has Been to a Shop

After the car has been to a repair shop always check over some of the things that have nothing to do with the trouble that occasioned the servicing. This is important where cars are taken to shops that do not specialize in the particular make.

What happens in many cases is that mechanics disconnect things and loosen parts that do not need to be touched. They are not quite familiar with the preliminaries to the real work and are obliged to experiment a little. The things that are disturbed in this way are not likely to be thought of when they come to finish the work.

Where the authorized service station does the work it is seldom that anything is disturbed unnecessarily. Any mechanic prefers to check over his work a little but often he is rushed by the impatient owner.

Great Britain Clings to "Keep to Left"

Great Britain still clings to the "keep to the left" rule of the road, despite the fact that the "right" is generally accepted throughout the world, according to the foreign travel division of the American Automobile association.

Aside from Great Britain, other countries which have the left rule are: Alderney, Czechoslovakia, Gold Coast, Guernsey, Hungary, India, Irish Free State, Jersey, Malta, Northern Ireland, Rhodesia and Sweden.

THE MOTOR QUIZ

(How Many Can You Answer?)

Q. What effect on engine performance is produced by improper spacing of spark plug gaps?

Ans. Too close spacing causes the car to jerk at low speed; too wide spacing will cause the engine to miss at high speed or in climbing hills. The proper spacing for high compression engines is .020 inches and low compression .025 inches.

Q. What percentage of new cars is sold on time?

Ans. Fifty-eight per cent.

Q. How many automobile dealers are there in the United States?

Ans. Fifty-three thousand and ninety-one.

Q. What country has the most automobiles per mile of road?

Ans. Mexico, with 37.7. United States ranks tenth, with 7.8.

Q. What is considered the average life of an automobile?

Ans. About six and three-quarter years.

Wire Useful to Remove Broken End of an Axle

With some types of rear axles it is difficult to remove the broken end without taking off the differential housing cover. The picture shows how to accomplish this job without disturbing the cover. A loop is formed on end of the wire as shown. The wire, of course, should be so stiff that the loop can be slipped down over the end of the axle. The slip noose arrangement will afford a sufficiently good purchase on the end of the axle to pull it out.—Popular Science Monthly.

Jay Walking Barred by Authorities of Paris

The authorities of Paris have adopted American methods for the protection of pedestrians. Large brass studs have been placed in the pavements to show the pedestrian where he may safely make a dash to the other side of the street, and pedestrians are expected to use this space and no other. The century-old-custom in France of allowing persons to cross the road where and when they will has been abandoned, much to the disgust of 30,000 Parisians, who paid fines for crossing the highways in the old-fashioned way.

AUTOMOBILE FACTS

The Wisconsin traffic code gives a cow in the road the right-of-way over an automobile. The pedestrian gets his under it.

• • •

"Fading" is the term that describes the lowered efficiency of the brakes after they have been "on" some time. Heat causes it.

• • •

Rust on the rims is hard on the rubber of the tires. It should be removed and the spot covered with an aluminum paint.

• • •

With the average car speeds going up, designers are making every effort to raise the point at which gasoline consumption is lowest.

• • •

Successful two-way radio demonstrations are slightly reminiscent of the early days of the automobile, when proud owners bragged of "getting there and back" in their machines.

IT'S Sir Walter speaking. What, Sir Walter Raleigh? The same.

Some months ago he offered pipe lovers a free booklet on "How to take care of your pipe." And the poor chap's been buried under requests ever since.

However, we've succeeded in engaging two of Queen Elizabeth's ladies-in-waiting to help the old boy out with his mail—so don't hesitate to send for your copy. It tells you how to break in a new pipe—how to keep it sweet and mellow—how to make an old pipe smoke smoother and better—the proper way to clean a pipe—and a lot of worth-while hints on pipe hygiene.

If you're a pipe smoker, you'll want to read this booklet. It's free. Just write to the Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corporation, Louisville, Ky.

A Universal Desire

The profession of funeral directing was developed as a response to the universal desire to pay all possible respect to the remains of those who have pased on. The modern funeral director is a man of specialized technical training and long practical experience. His function is to give necessary counsel and advice, as well as actual service, to those bereaved.

The members of this organization are fully prepared to serve in such a manner.

THE BACK SEAT IS NO LONGER detachable

"Without tonneau," an automobile advertisement of twenty-five years ago proclaimed, "the touring car is the smartest of runabouts." The "detachable tonneau" of a bygone day, providing the motorist with "two cars in one," has become the modern rumble seat. ¶ As the automobile developments came, one motor oil —Shell—has always been ready for every new lubrication requirement. Shell Motor Oil is ready now for the cars which will be announced next year. ¶ Nature's best-balanced crude and Shell's low-temperature refining combine to prepare Shell Motor Oil for any service . . . to make it safer in any demand you may make on your motor. That explains why so many are changing to Shell Motor Oil for its improved performance and longer motor life. Have you tried it?

EFFECTS OF THE HEAT

'Twas an hour after midnight
And all through the home,
Not a creature was sleeping—
There was many a moan!

Bed clothes were discarded; pajamas exposed,
With petulant ejaculations, mumbles and groans,
From bedroom to kitchen, even out on the cot—
Believe it or not, it surely was hot!

The SANDMAN STORY

ABOUT TATTLETALES

MOTHER GOSSIP, as you probably know, has curled lips and a very ugly expression to her very ugly face. Sometimes, though, you don't see how ugly it is at first.

You may think it's an attractive face. But you won't think that way if you talk to her long. You'll begin to see the lips curl and the ugly expression, and you'll say to yourself:

"Oh, you ugly, mean-looking thing!"

Mother Gossip can never really see herself. She has a number of children but the Tattletale Twins are her pets.

She loves to hear stories children tell on each other. She lives where the mountains are made of mole hills, and among her other children are the Hearsay Triplets, the Exaggeration Boys, and her daughters, I-make-a-point-to-repeat-mean things, as well as her twins, I-heard-something-mean-

Mother Gossip Can Never Really See Herself.

some-one-said-about-you-but-I-stood-up-for-you. Mother Gossip is fond of this twin, too, for Mother Gossip thinks it is nice to repeat the mean speeches, and then excuse one's self by saying: "I stood up for you."

The kind of person who wouldn't repeat a mean speech but who would stand up for a friend without having to tell the friend so, is not the kind Mother Gossip likes. She has such curious tastes.

Well, one day Mother Gossip was alone. All her children were wandering about, causing unhappiness and sadness. They were telling on others, they were making people feel sad because of mean, bitter, unkind speeches, and they were doing just those things that would please mean Mother Gossip when they told her about it.

Master Thoughtfulness, who hates cruelty above all things, and who considers saying mean things a form of cruelty, tried to do all he could with her.

"What is the use of making people unhappy?" he asked her. "You know it makes them unhappy when you say mean things and when you repeat mean speeches others have made.

"People may try to be sensible and say to themselves:

"'I won't let it hurt my feelings. Anyone who is going to repeat mean speeches doesn't deserve to be noticed to that extent.'

"But just the same it is hard not to have one's feelings hurt."

"I know it," sneered Mother Gossip.

"It began so long ago," she said after a little. "You know how people speak of idle gossip?"

"It is certainly idle enough to gossip," Master Thoughtfulness sighed.

"There were a lot of people with nothing to do, nothing to think about, nothing to be happy about, nothing with which to play, nothing for which to care.

"There was just a group of these people. They had been brought up by a nurse employed by all of their mothers, whose name was Nurse Whine.

"Nurse Whine didn't play with the children, or read to them, or do anything with them, for she was interested in a person whose name was Master Complaint, and she was going to marry him as soon as the last of these children grew up.

"Well, the children grew up. They'd no idea how to be happy. And they only knew—or thought they knew—that there was nothing to do.

"Out of this lack of doing anything they began to scold each other, and then talk about each other. And the habit grew and grew so that the only times they found anything to do were those times when they talked about each other.

"Then I came along and I was the same way. If people want to be happy and make others happy they should avoid me. I am never really happy.

"I only get excited over gossip. I just can't help it. I come from a lot of idle ones and so I'm often called Idle Gossip. It means that I don't count for anything—I'm idle, useless.

"But it's my nature. By the way, Master Thoughtfulness, you know I heard some one say they thought you were stingy."

But Master Thoughtfulness had fled. The best thing to do was to keep far away from Mother Gossip.

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

HAIR BURNING AND LONGEVITY

PUT some of your hair in the fire. If it burns slowly you will have a long life; if it burns quickly a short one. This rather common superstition has as its basis that primitive conception of the hair as being, like the nails, a vital and integral part of the man himself—a conception which is found surviving in many modern superstitions. So much was the hair regarded as the person himself that the ancients frequently offered their hair in sacrifices instead of immolating themselves, which was just as effective and much pleasanter. In the superstition under consideration we see a survival of this custom, an offering of the hair to the gods. And as in all sacrifices the devotees sought for a sign in the condition of the victim which was revealed by an examination after sacrifice, or in the manner in which that which was sacrificed underwent the operation, so we see the idea continuing down to us of a prognostic in the slowness of rapidity of the burning of the hair. Some anthropologists hold that the offering of hair to the gods was originally a vicarious human sacrifice and came in when human sacrifices themselves began to lose their popularity as savagery decayed.

How It Started

THE WORD 'DETERIORATE'

HERE is one of the most extraordinary words in our language.

Almost any word we can think of is either a modification of a former root or a combination of prefix or suffix with a root, or a prefix, a root and a suffix.

It is rarely indeed, however, that we find a word which has no root, but which is a combination made up entirely of prefixes or suffixes, or both. "Deteriorate," which is composed of the prefix "de," meaning "away from," and the suffixes "ter" "ior," expressing comparison.

We moderns use the word "deteriorate" in reference to something that is "going down," and this sense it comes by honestly from its Latin forbears. For when the old Romans characterized anything as "deteriorating" they intended to convey the idea that it was getting worse and worse, in comparison with something else.

For Meditation

By LEONARD A. BARRETT

WHITHER BOUND?

THE speed of our modern age leads us to seriously ask, whither bound? One needs only to witness the countless number of automobiles rushing through our city streets to be impressed with the fact that speed is the distinguishing mark of our times. The crowd is madly rushing somewhere, but if asked, "where?" the reply would doubtless be "anywhere." The desire seems to be to keep on going. The demand is for action, much of which seems to be without a definite objective. To the crowd rushing on with breakneck speed, we would ask the question, whither bound?

L. A. Barrett.

More important is the advance movement in science. Here we find a definite purpose which science hopes to accomplish. The advance, however, has in many respects been startling. The atom is no longer the smallest particle of matter, the electron has come to take its place. Now we have the promise of the split atom. By splitting the atoms of mercury we have gold. Only a prophet can tell what will be the result of this latest achievement if put to practical use. Television has come to stay. We no longer need be satisfied by just hearing the music in a distant city. We shall be able to see, upon a silver screen, the opera reproduced before us. Of the marvelous achievements in the field of science, we ask, whither bound?

In the world of social values, with many of its moral norms, different from those of our forefathers, we ask, whither bound? The increase in divorce, the economic pressure of our age making early marriage almost prohibitive, presents serious problems—whither bound?

In the educational world, a large number of young people annually complete their college courses and are ready to enter upon their life's work, and we ask, whither bound?

The final answer to this question must find expression not in monetary standards or statistical tables. The final answer must be given in terms of character building. Are we stronger physically, nobler in our appreciation of moral values and more sincere in our attitude toward the things of the building our chief objective? Let us remember the words of Emerson—"The hand cannot achieve anything higher than the character can inspire."

Dear Editor:

WEEK ending with a rich friend recently I was led on a ten-mile walk through the woods. You'd be surprised how interesting the country is and how much there is of it.

My contacts with nature have chiefly been unfavorable—getting stuck up with thistle burrs, or scratched with poison ivy, or tearing my pants on a stump. But the walk was delightful. I wasn't lame for more than two or three days.

And then—all of us have our thrifty habits—we drove around and around to use up the last four gallons of gas before the host put his car away. We saw most of Cape Cod on those four gallons, it seemed to me.

I suppose the trouble was, we had nowhere special to go.—Fred Barton.

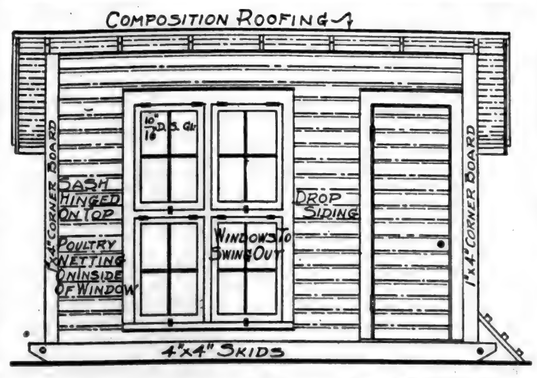
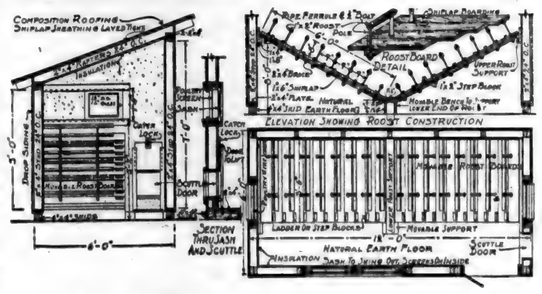
Poultry House Designed to Get Best Results From Farm Flock





By W. A. RADFORD

Mr. William A. Radford will answer questions and give advice FREE OF COST on all problems pertaining to the subject of building work on the farm, for the readers of this paper. On account of his wide experience as editor, author and manufacturer, he is, without doubt, the highest authority on the subject. Address all inquiries to William A. Radford, No. 407 South Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill., and only inclose two-cent stamp for reply.

Building materials, together with many other commodities, are relatively low in price now, so that farmers who have delayed erecting new buildings can go ahead with the assurance that costs probably will not be less in a number of years. Farm building since the war has been neglected because of high prices of materials and labor. The present scale of costs coupled with the fact that modern farm buildings are profitable investments should cause a resumption in the erection of new farm improvements.

While the poultry industry is in a slump this summer, there is no reason to believe it will not revive. But in order to make it profitable farmers and poultrymen must provide their flocks with houses where the birds will do their best. In connection with this article there is shown an illustration of a small shed roof poultry house and practically complete plans showing how this building is erected, and the materials used. This type of house is a proper house for the young pullets which are kept on range throughout the summer. However, there is no reason why this house cannot be used for layers during the fall and winter. The architect's drawing which accompanies the exterior view of the building consists of a front elevation, a cross-section and floor plans, together with details of construction. The dimensions of the materials used are indicated on the cross-section and in the details.

Brighten Up Dark Rooms With Cheerful Colors

Whether a person is building or renovating, one is nearly always confronted with the problem of dark rooms.

The northern exposure needs sunlight, the eastern exposure warmth of tone. Even the western and southern exposures may often have too little light from a too small window or an obstruction of sunshine by neighboring buildings. Occasionally there will even be a windowless room.

The last problem is a common one in the older parts of cities, where the dark "middle room" of the house is a usual architectural feature. The interesting manner in which this situation has been handled in one such home is worthy of the attention of anyone who would like to make sunlight for a sunless room.

The walls are painted a warm cream, while the woodwork, which fills an entire side of the room with a series of charming little cupboards, is ivory white.

The double doors leading to the passage which turns onto the patio are half of glass, as are those leading on the other side of the living room. Both are hung with gold-colored gauze, through which the light filters with a suggestion of sun. Glittering brass candlesticks and a gilt china bowl on the table, repeat this suggestion.

Not only is a light color used for this room, but a paint carefully selected for finish. A glossy surface generally reflects more light than a dull one, and while the walls and woodwork need not necessarily have a high gloss finish, the flat finish, which always absorbs a certain amount of light, must be avoided in such a situation.

In every detail, where it can profitably be done—in hue, value and what may here be referred to as texture—everything in this treatment is subordinated to light making. The success may be estimated to some degree by the electric light fixtures chosen. Two small fixtures suffice, proving the luminous qualities of the finish for artificial light.

Of course, this problem of a windowless room is not a particularly common one in most parts of the country, but there is seldom to be found a house or an apartment that has not some poorly lighted place. Hallways, bathrooms and kitchens frequently suffer in this respect. Attics, too, are almost invariably dark.

For these, proper color selection can achieve astounding results. A light, bright color should always be used. Where sunlight is lacking, it is particularly essential to provide the missing warmth of tone.

For this purpose no color is better suited than yellow. Deep ivory, buff and rose are also warm colors, and well adapted to a northern or eastern exposure. The darker the room the paler should be the shade selected.

For a very dark room a pale yellow or cream has excellent light-reflecting properties. The effect of the glossy and the flat finish is also worth remembering.

Roofs No Longer Mere Covering Over the Home

The day has passed when the roof of a home is regarded as the covering over four walls and nothing more. The roof is an important part of the house exterior and should have the same architectural treatment and consideration as the rest of the house.

Today roofs are recognized as comprising more than a mere necessity (a necessary expense) in house construction; they are character-endowing, beauty-enhancing features, fitting in with particular types of architecture, yet losing none of their usefulness, says a statement issued by a well-known architect.

"Progress in roof designing has been steady," the statement goes on. "In the last decade some particularly noteworthy strides have been made. The departure from the purely utilitarian field began in all probability with the gradual assumption of broken lines and the consequent elimination of some of the oversevere regularity."

Harmonious Effect Should Be in Trim and Walls

The trim should, if possible, be of the same hue (color) as the walls. In times past we thought that the trim should form a harmonious unity with the walls. If the trim must be of a different hue we should take care that the brightness or value is the same. Otherwise there would be a suggestion of hard and inconsistent lines, which in turn would produce a feeling of restlessness.

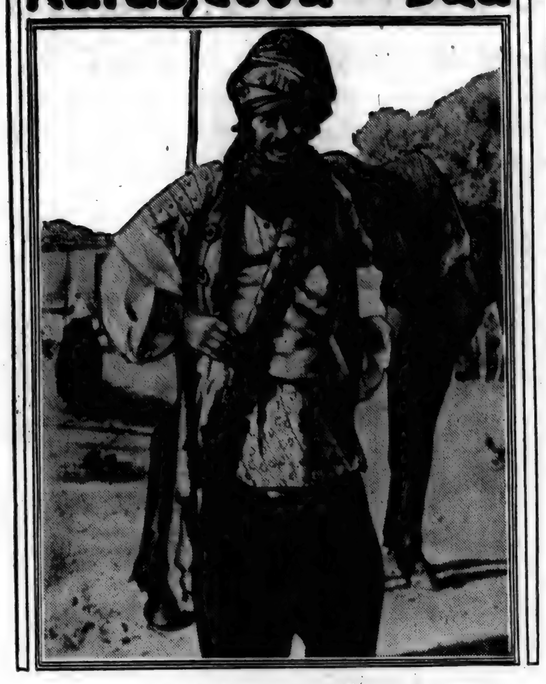
Kurds, Good and Bad



A Kurd of the Turkey-Persia Border.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

THE Kurds, who have revolted along the Turkish-Persian border and against whom large Turkish forces have been operating near famous Mount Ararat, have been fighting periodically against the established states of Asia Minor for thousands of years. Always their favorite method of strife has been guerrilla warfare. They have been historic marauders, but perhaps they have every reason, so far as environment is concerned, to lead such lives. State after state has struck against them with forces more powerful than any they could raise.

The days of Assyrian power in Mesopotamia seem pretty far back toward the beginnings of history. Records of that empire show that time and again its soldiers were sent into the rough country around the headwaters of the great rivers to subdue the mountaineers—ancestors of the Kurds—who harried Assyria's outlying settlements. These same mountaineers fought the Armenians when the latter came into the region between 1,000 and 600 B. C.

When Xenophon retreated from Asia Minor in 401 B. C. the Kurds (then called the Carduchi) attacked his 10,000 Greeks, rolling great stones down on them from cliffs and mountains. They fought continually against the Bagdad caliphs. Since the Turks rose to power in Asia Minor the Kurds have fought them repeatedly; in fact, the Turks never established any considerable measure of control over these fierce, freedom-loving highlanders.

Since the World war the European territory of Turkey has been negligible. The country has consisted almost solely of the big, fat peninsula lying between the Black sea on the north and the eastern arm of the Mediterranean on the south, and an extension to the east about as broad as the Asia Minor peninsula, reaching roughly half way from the Black sea to the Caspian. The southern half of this eastern extension—the southeastern corner of postwar Turkey—is what is loosely called Kurdistan. The other half of the eastern extension, immediately north of Kurdistan, was once Turkish Armenia.

Kurdish Sphere Is Large.

Now that tens of thousands of the Armenian residents have been driven across the Russian border, while other tens of thousands have perished, the region hardly deserves the old name. The Kurdish population was always high in Turkish Armenia; now it is proportionately much greater. The whole eastern end of present Turkey, constituting almost a third of the territory of the country, therefore, may roughly be considered the Kurdish sphere of influence. It is in the northeast corner of Turkey that the Kurds have recently been most active.

Geographic and political and economic complications aplenty are found in this region. On the east Kurdistan touches Persia, and the people for a considerable distance into that country are Kurds, too. Indeed, Kurdish people inhabit the entire Zagros mountain range which extends from Turkey for 600 miles to the southeast, forming the boundary between Persia and Iraq.

The Kurds belong to the Iranian branch of the white race. Because of the open-air lives which they live, most of them have harsh features. The great majority are nominally Mohammedans.

The plateau region lying partly in old Armenia, partly in Kurdistan, where many of the most warlike Kurds live, presents a good example of the effects on man of a mixture of rugged uplands and fertile valleys. Limestone mountains and recently extinct volcanoes occupy the upper levels. Lower are magnificent canyons cut by the Tigris and Euphrates headstreams, and numerous broad, basin-shaped valleys whose floors are fertile plains. The ancestors of the Kurds were pushed from many of these desirable lowlands by the Armenian invasion and from others by the later arriving Turks.

Some Recent Revolts.

Even the fairly recent regime of Kemal Pasha has had several Kurdish revolts on its hands. There was a sporadic uprising in 1920; and in 1925 the tribesmen made an unsuccessful effort to set up their own government. The scrapping of the caliphate at Constantinople aroused them and nearly every change in old Moslem customs has irritated them. Revolt after revolt has been quelled but as soon as the Kurd replenishes his forces and supplies, he is ready to attack again.

The Kurd farmers of the Iraq plains are more prosperous than the tribesmen of the hill country. Travelers climb the trails of Kurdistan for miles without seeing a village. When one does appear, it is usually situated in a well protected spot. Houses are placed without regard to building line and a bird's-eye view of a village reveals a jumble of mud and stone structures.

The peasant's house is a one-room structure which might be mistaken for a stable. The tribesmen reserves one side of his abode for his animals while his family occupies the other side. Kurds sit on the floor when they rest or eat, therefore they do not need tables or chairs.

The tribal chief or headman fares better. He has a house for his family and a guest house where he lives and entertains guests. He is offended if a traveler does not stay with him. Once the traveler has stopped, he must remain for dinner. The food is placed on the floor in the center of the diners. Should a guest stretch his legs toward another person, convey food to his mouth with his left hand, or fondle the dog, his host is offended. No knives and forks are to be found in the Kurd silver chest but if a guest has difficulty in feeding himself with his hands, a spoon will be handed to him. Few meals are served that do not include mast (curdled milk) the favorite dish of the Kurd. A little water mixed with the mast makes mastao, the Kurd "national" drink. The tribesmen like vegetables but seldom serve meat.

They Buy Their Wives.

Under Moslem law, the Kurd may take four wives. Wives are bought, so the peasant usually has only one. The chiefs take the full quota. Wives are priced according to their rank. The tribesman can get a wife in exchange for a pony or goat, or one may cost the equivalent of $2,500. The wedding entails a season of merrymaking in which the whole tribe joins, but it takes less than a minute to dissolve a union. The man simply says "I divorce you" three times and the parties are free.

To the foreigner, the Kurds seem to know little else than the "art" of highway robbery. Many of the mountain tribesmen are adept thieves, but in the hills as well as the plains, many Kurds earn honest livings by farming and cattle raising. Kurds are pastoral people, seldom moving from their villages except to migrate to higher altitudes during the summer for new pasturage.

In spite of exciting events in the fighting history of the Kurds, the tribesmen were almost unknown outside the Near East before the World war. When a delegation of Kurds appeared at the peace conferences in 1919 newspaper men did not know who the sunburnt tribesmen might be. When their identity was revealed the Kurds went on the front pages and frequently have been there since.

The presence of Kurds in the Mosul region of what is now northern Iraq was a hard diplomatic problem for the treaty drafters to solve after the World war. Except in Mosul City, the population of this region is almost solidly Kurdish. It is the odor and power of petroleum that in some ways dominate all else in this region. What promises to become one of the major oil fields of the world centers about Mosul.

WRAPS REFLECT MODES OF '60s; FROCKS FOR PLAY AND SCHOOL

YESTERDAY we smiled at the amusing little basque-like wraps such as were "all the style" in the '60s, wondering how anyone could ever think of wearing such "funny looking" fashions. Today we are proudly sallying forth arrayed in little wraps the very replica of those "impossible" styles as they appeared in the pages of Godey's Lady's book or as reflected in the faded daguerreotypes of the long ago.

Fashion can do just that! Change the mind of her followers over night. It is exactly what she is doing this season—converting us from scoffers into ardent worshipers of the very modes which once we dismissed as "old-fashioned." So here we are paying homage to the quaintest looking little wraps that have appeared since "befo' the wuh"—the Civil war if you please.

Now that fashion's followers are started in that direction there is no stopping them. They are fairly clamoring, especially the younger element, for quaint colorful little wraps like the one shown to the left in the picture. This one is a Chanel model of cerise velveteen. It is only hip-length, as you see, with a cleverly flared peplum. The cape sleeves are just such as graced the little paletots, as our great-great-grandmothers pleased to call their wraps of this type. The paletot of today leads a dual existence as it is as much at home posed over a tennis frock as it is over an evening gown.

The short graceful cape on the other figure is of red velvet. The gown with which it is worn is fashioned of hand-painted white moire. A most interesting treatment at the back distinguishes this wrap, a graceful drape effect ending in a soft bow arrangement. The cape is brought snugly about the hips with the aid of a surplice fastening.

The story of these frivolous little wraps cannot be told in a few paragraphs. It would take many chapters to do them justice. However there are a few high spots which should be touched upon in even a brief mention of these cunning fantasies which are adding such a piquant note to the present-day costume. There is, for instance, the "scrumptious" hiplength wrap all covered with glittering sequins, which is quite the newest thing for formal evening wear. And have you seen the new so-called "bunny" wraps which are made of dainty white fur and which reaches not much below the waistline? They are a midseason and early fall item, designed to be worn over sheer fluttery frocks. They are "darling."

TWO POPULAR LITTLE WRAPS

For Play and School.

Oh, if some genius would only invent durable, comfortable, practical, attractive frocks for little girls, outfits for little boys, and sunsuits for both that will not continously rip, tear and wrinkle during the siege of hours of play and hours of school—garments that do not demand a repeat-and-repeat performance of starching, of ironing and that come from their tubbing almost if not quite as prettily colorful as new. Mothers do indulge in dreams just like that.

Sometimes dreams come true. We are inclined to think that the little dress in the lower picture is evidence that they do. It is a knitted dress not of wool, for children draw the line at wearing wool, not of silk for silk is far too dressy for ordinary wear, but guess what. Give up? Well, the answer is beautiful sturdy and at the same time soft-to-the-touch cotton, durene cotton, if you please. Durened cotton is really mercerized cotton, the fiber being treated in a way to bring out a subtle luster, and best of all to withstand intensive wear and endless laundering.

These practical fashions of knitted cotton which children's specialty shops and departments are displaying with such pride are not beset with frills and furbelows (another point in their favor), but they are charmingly colorful, coming in a range of beguiling pastel shades. The little two-piece school frock illustrated is in an adorable shade of blue.

Youngsters with a desire for gay color can have many kinds of both underwear and outerwear in this sturdy knitted pastel cotton such as fine-mesh durene shirts, panties, union suits, sun suits and cunning costumes with smartly styled skirts and clever cardigans and sleeveless sweaters.

The typical undergarment for infants has been serviceable and unimaginative for years. It is only just recently that stylists have interested themselves in fashion appeal as well as that of service, and so it is that emphasis is now being placed on pastel colors for "young" underwear as well as upon outer apparel.

Happy Woman Tells How She Lost 19 Pounds of Fat in 27 Days

During October a woman in Montana wrote—"My first bottle of Kruschen Salts lasted almost 4 weeks and during that time I lost 19 pounds of fat—Kruschen is all you claim for it—I feel better than I have for years."

Here's the recipe that banishes fat and brings into blossom all the natural attractiveness that every woman possesses.

Every morning take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen Salts in a glass of hot water before breakfast.

Be sure and do this every morning for "It's the little daily dose that takes off the fat."—Don't miss a morning. The Kruschen habit means that every particle of poisonous waste matter and harmful acids and gases are expelled from the system.

At the same time the stomach, liver kidneys and bowels are toned up and the pure, fresh blood containing Nature's six life-giving salts are carried to every organ, gland, nerve and fibre of the body and this is followed by "that Kruschen feeling" of energetic health and activity that is reflected in bright eyes, clear skin, cheerful vivacity and charming figure.

If you want to lose fat with speed get an 85c bottle of Kruschen Salts from any live druggist anywhere in America with the distinct understanding that you must be satisfied with results or money back.

Naturalist Will Study Creatures of the Sea

Dr. William Beebe, a famous naturalist, has gone to Nonesuch island, Bermuda, to study the strange creatures that live in the sea. He is to live with them, but will pursue his studies in a special under water apparatus fitted with thick glass windows. Doctor Beebe hopes to reach a depth of nearly 1,700 feet and to discover many new kinds of marine life. The ordinary diving apparatus consists of a helmet with glass "eyes" secured to a waterproof dress which covers the whole body except the hands, a flexible tube connected with a pump which provides air, a 40-pound weight for the chest, a similar weight for the back, boots soled with 16 pounds of lead, and a lifeline, in which in most cases telephone wires are embedded. A diving suit of metal is used by divers when they work at great depths.

MRS. SARAH PHILLIPS OLDEST SETTLER

The oldest person to register Thursday at the Old Settlers' meeting was Mrs. Sarah Phillips, of Jackson township, 96 years of age. Another Mrs. Sarah Phillips, residing at Waterloo is 95; W. H. McIntosh of Auburn is 93 and John C. Reed of Waterloo, 90 years.

Harry M. Shull, of Union township, is the new president of the DeKalb County Old Settlers' association for 1930-31. Other officers elected at the annual meeting and reunion in Auburn Thursday included Mrs. Flora Green, vice president; Mrs. Pauline Rhodefer, secretary; Flora Kraus, treasurer; Frank Nicolai, publicity and E. E. Stinson, arrangements.

The day was ideal for the annual gathering. The weather was perfect. At 3 o'clock four hundred and sixty-five old settlers—those who have resided continuously in DeKalb county forty years or more had their names placed on the record by the registration committee, Mrs. Flora Green, Mrs. Lottie Bolinger, Mrs. Elizabeth Daniel and Mrs. Etta Weaver.

Unlike previous years when free acts, an entertainment at the Court theatre and a speech were given, the program this year was of a community nature. The St. Joe band played, giving several concerts. There was also a program by the Columbia City high school band of sixty pieces, advertising the Old Settlers' meeting at Columbia City next Thursday, August 21st.

At 2 o'clock, W. C. McBride, president this year, welcomed the old settlers and announced the program. It consisted of numbers from each township of DeKalb county. There were vocal and instrumental selections, stunts and playlets.

The 4-H Club entries drew good crowds. The girls displayed sewing and baked goods, while the boys were interested in stock.

Merriwold Farm Drew Many Ribbons

The following were given awards at the first show of the DeKalb County Jersey Breeders association in Auburn on Thursday.

Senior yearling bulls—first Mrs. Cora Markle, Waterloo and second Archie Hewitt, Corunna.

Junior yearling bulls—first H. P. Steele, Butler and second Clyde Husselman, Auburn.

Bull calf—first Archie Hewitt, Corunna, second George Hart, St. Joe and third Mrs. Cora Markle, Waterloo.

Grand champion was won by Mrs. Cora Markle's senior yearling.

The aged cow—first H. P. Steele, Butler, second Geo. B. Hart, St. Joe and third H. P. Steele, Butler.

Three year old cows—first H. P. Steele, Butler.

Senior yearling females—first Geo. B. Hart, second Archie Hewitt and third H. P. Steele.

Female calf—first Archie Hewitt, second J. E. Brown, Auburn, third Archie Hewitt and fourth J. E. Brown.

Grand champion female was won by H. P. Steele on aged cow.

Get of sire—first Archie Hewitt and second H. P. Steele.

Produce of dam—first Archie Hewitt, second Geo. B. Hart and third H. P. Steele.

OBERHOLTZER REUNION

The thirty-third annual reunion of the Oberholtzer family was held at the home of Mrs. Matilda Oberholtzer, north of Harlan, on Sunday, August 17, 1930.

During the morning hours the relatives and friends assembled and at noon a bountiful dinner was served to which all did ample justice.

After the dinner and social hour a short program, consisting of songs and recitations was given followed by the business meeting in which Mr. William Oberholtzer of Butler was elected president, Ellis Oberholtzer, Three Rivers, Mich., vice president and Gaylon Markle, Spencerville, secretary and treasurer. The meeting was dismissed by Rev. Mumma after which contests were enjoyed by both old and young.

Thirty-three years ago this reunion was organized at this same home and on this occasion one hundred and thirty-three were present to enjoy the day.

Those present were Mrs. Matilda Oberholtzer, Miss Cozy Oberholtzer, Mr. and Mrs. Doy Gorrell and children, Mr. and Mrs. Martin Beery, Mr. Emmett Guiff, Mr. Charles Zeis, Mrs. Mary Pierman and children, Mr. Zenno Brandon, Rev. and Mrs. A. K. Mumma, Mrs. Lucinda Sanders, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Oetting, and C. A. Hartzell, all of Harlan; Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Goldsmith, Mr. and Mrs. James Oberholtzer, Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Miller and children, Mrs. Minnie Oberholtzer and children, Mr. and Mrs. Eck Hursh and family, Mr. and Mrs. B. F. Markle and family, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Dean and daughter, Joyce, Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Sommers, Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Goldsmith, Mrs. R. S. Deitrick, Mr. and Mrs. Herman Shaeffer and children, all of Spencerville.

Mr. Albert Chausee, Mr. and Mrs. George Doll and daughter, Ruthanna, Mr. and Mrs. F. C. Son Lends Encouragement

"I understand that your boy Josh is interested in perpetual motion."

"Yes," replied Farmer Hawbuck, "and I'm kinder encouraged about it. I thought for a while that the only thing Josh was interested in was perpetual rest."

Mrs. Harcourt Miser, of Albion was a Wednesday guest in the Ed Miser home.

GOV. LESLIE ISSUES HIS LABOR DAY PROCLAMATION

Governor Harry G. Leslie today issued a proclamation urging the fitting observance of Monday, September 1, as Labor Day.

The proclamation follows:

Fruitful farms, bristling smokestacks, charred skyscrapers and yawning caverns in mother earth are mute testimony to the part labor has played in our industrial life. The scream of whistle, whir of pulley and shout of cowboy make a chorus of industrial music that is heard the length and breadth of our land. The interdependence and co-operation of labor and capital have created an economic life that is the envy of the rest of the world. Twice blessed is he whose welfare depends upon the labor of hand and mind. The happiness and contentment of any people is measured by the extent of its employment in profitable labor.

"By custom and statute the first Monday in September has been set aside as Labor Day.

"Therefore, I, Harry G. Leslie, Governor of the State of Indiana, declare Monday, September 1, 1930, as Labor Day and urge such exercises and ceremonies to be observed as shall fittingly commemorate and do honor to labor."

FIRE MARSHAL REPORTS WORK OF JULY

Alfred Hogston, State Fire Marshal, has issued the following statement in regard to State Fire Marshal Department activities for the month of July.

The inspection Division inspected 133 buildings considered as fire hazards. 98 compliances with orders were made on these inspections, most of such compliances being voluntary on the part of the owner and without formal orders being issued by the Department. In addition, there were 190 compliances on overdue orders, most of these having had extensions of time.

The Arson Division has been unusually active because of the great number of fires of suspicious origin. 23 new cases were investigated and 1 old case re-investigated. 8 confessions were secured. 1 case was submitted to the Grand Jury and 5 were filed in Court by affidavit. 16 cases are now pending in Court; 2 cases were tried and 2 convictions secured. No case has been dismissed from Court, there were no acquittals and no disagreements.

"There have been on an average 2 new cases a day reported to the Arson Division for investigation" Mr. Hogston stated. "Also, the Department records show that a person or firm that has had one suspicious fire quite often has others. The Fire Marshal Department is making a very close check on such cases with the intention of curtailing what may be tered a "chronic occurrence."

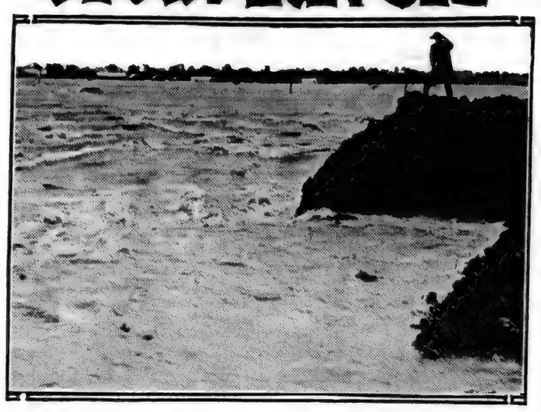
Great Rivers



Flood Waters Raging Through a Break in a Mississippi Levee.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

NATURE played favorites in apportioning the great rivers of the world. Of the dozen largest, six are in Asia and three in Africa, leaving only three for the two continents of the New world. And among the twelve leaders, Europe and Australia are wholly unrepresented.

The longest single river is the Nile, measuring some 4,000 miles from head to mouth. The Nile is further distinguished in that it has no tributaries for the last 1,500 miles of its course to the sea. During this stretch its waters are considerably reduced in volume by evaporation and irrigation, so that it grows smaller instead of larger toward its mouth.

Other African rivers among the length-scoring twelve are the Niger and the Congo, both fed by the tropical rains of hot regions near the Equator. In a general way they more nearly resemble South America's representative, the Amazon, than the great streams of the colder northern continents.

Of Asia's six longest rivers, four are in Siberia, the Ob, Yenisei and Lena, flowing north into the Arctic ocean, and the Amur emptying into an arm of the Pacific. The other two are the Yangtze and Hwang, or Yellow, river of China.

These twelve river basins represent the greatest variety of climate and civilization. The Amazon and the Congo flow through lush equatorial jungles inhabited by birds of brilliant plumage, wild animals and savage tribes, while the mouths of the Yenisei and the Lena are above the northern timber line and their valleys support the sparsest population. The Mississippi and the Yangtze flow through established, if divergent, civilizations, with rich cities along their banks like jewels on a string. The Nile is one of the cradles of world history; the Mackenzie is still a frontier stream.

Five of the dozen rivers flow to the north. These are the Nile, Mackenzie, Ob, Yenisei, and Lena. The Mississippi and Niger flow south. The Amur, Yangtze, Hwang and Amazon run eastward. Only the Congo points toward the west.

Difference in Floods.

All these streams overflow their banks at intervals but the results are strangely different. In the case of the Mississippi and the Yangtze, floods are national disasters bringing untold suffering to millions. The annual overflow of the Nile with resulting fertilization of the valley by the deposit of silt is the source of the wealth of Egypt. The Hwang, or Yellow river, from its habit of overflowing its banks and changing its entire course at intervals is known as the "scourge of China."

The Amazon and the Congo lie almost under the Equator, and the other ten longest rivers are in the northern hemisphere. Four flow into the Arctic ocean. A reason is not far to seek. The greatest land masses are in the northern half of the world, and without large land areas long rivers are impossible. The smaller continents of Australia and Europe are not represented in the dozen. Similarly, the reason for the longest rivers flowing to the north and east is that the longest continental slopes extend in those directions.

The Yangtze and the Mississippi are lined with wealthy cities largely because of their location in the temperate zone. The tropic Amazon, Niger, and Congo are too hot; the Mackenzie and the Siberian rivers are too cold for the favorable growth of towns. The Nile valley beyond Cairo is a mere strip of green from 15 to 30 miles wide between two burning deserts. The Hwang is too variable in its habits to encourage navigation or river ports.

From the earliest times these long rivers have furnished high roads for the exploration of continental interiors. Nero sent an expedition to discover the headwaters of the Nile, which failed to reach its objective. Russian penetration of Siberia followed the great river beds. The Amazon and the Congo are still highways of discovery. Head reaches of the Yangtze are veiled in Asiatic obscurity. The Niger was the river of romance in the great days of Timbuktu. The histories of the world's river basins have been the history of the world's empires. A great river is both a roadway and a source of life.

Menace of the Mississippi.

Although North America can claim only two of the world's dozen longest rivers, it possesses in the Mississippi-Missouri the longest of them all. This magnitude of the Mississippi is becoming more and more of a menace because each flood seems greater than the preceding one. Why this should be true has been a problem to some laymen; but one of the chief factors is plain enough: it is the usually laudable effort of Americans to develop and build up their country.

Aside from the fact that several decades ago there were fewer people living and fewer dollars invested in the regions subject to overflow in the lower Mississippi valley, the flood stages were actually lower in those days. They were lower, to consider one important fact, for the very good reason that then less water was fed into the Mississippi's 100,000 tributaries in a given space of time. Forests and woodlands that do not now exist held a large part of the rainfall and fed it slowly into brooks and creeks and rivers. Irregularities in the lie of the land formed puddles that later evaporated, or sent rills in tortuous paths that slowed up the runoff.

In late years a constantly increasing population has been busy changing these conditions. Every tree cut, every roof built, every street paved, every drainage ditch dug, and every culvert constructed in the vast area drained by the Mississippi river system has done its bit toward pouring rainfall more quickly into the great river.

Not only has man helped to put more water into the Mississippi; his works have helped to confine it there. When De Soto and his followers first knew the Mississippi it spread out at each flood season over a wide area. Sometimes in its lower reaches it was 20, 30, and even 40 miles wide.

The fact that the flood waters spilled away at numerous places into swamps and lowlands kept the flood crest down in the lower river. In 1717 three-foot levees protected New Orleans. Now they rise 25 feet or more above the city. Even as late as 1882 the highest flood stage at New Orleans was 16 feet. In 1922 it was above 22 feet. One reason, at least, for this, is that more efficient levee maintenance for many hundreds of miles along the river has herded the flood waters past New Orleans as well as other lower river points in the regular channel.

Levees Protect Vast Areas.

More intensive development of the lowlands has made this levee system necessary. Now some 29,000 square miles are dependent on the levees for protection. Breaks still occur, and when they do they drain off some of the flood waters and so relieve in some measure the strain on the banks farther down stream. But it is not the innocuous affair that it was in the days of De Soto. Now towns and plantations, railways and industrial plants lie in the lowlands, and any "relief" that a levee break may occasion to down-river points is at a cost of many lives and much valuable property.

On the whole a considerable quantity of water finds its way from the lower Mississippi through levee breaks and bayous. The most important natural safety valve is the Atchafalaya river or bayou which flows away from the Mississippi at the mouth of the Red river, and finds its way directly to the Gulf of Mexico some 50 miles west of New Orleans. In flood times this out-flowing stream takes from the swollen Mississippi as much as 350,000 cubic feet of water each second—an amount equal to more than half the average flow of the Mississippi. It is because of such losses as this, coupled with the much greater depth of the channel in the lower river, that the flood stage can be between 50 and 60 feet at Memphis and Vicksburg, and only a little more than 20 at New Orleans.

The Mississippi river system is truly a continental feature, draining a million and a quarter of the three million odd square miles of the United States. Thirty of the 48 states send a greater or less contribution of water to this great stream.

The main Mississippi river is more than 2,500 miles long, while the Mississippi-Missouri is 4,200 miles in length—the longest river system in the world. The great scale on which the Mississippi is built becomes evident when one considers the time required for floods to pass down its course. About thirty days are required for the surging flood crest to pass from the mouth of the Ohio to New Orleans, and from ten days to two weeks from Greenville, Miss., to New Orleans.

The SANDMAN STORY

ABOUT WIND'S PALACE

"YOU can leave the Wind's Sleeping Palace any time you wish," the snake told Tommy, who, off adventuring, hurried along.

"You won't lose your way. You can see the mountain top from there and you'll find anyone around the mountain top can direct you to the cave. You'll find the pond yourself."

After this they didn't speak. They went through some more woods, and then at the edge of the woods in a hilly field, Tommy saw the Wind's Sleeping Palace.

He never believed anything could be so wonderful. He just wanted to stand and stare at it.

"Take your time," the snake said. "I'm hurrying off to the Rock Sleeping apartments of the Snakes. They're over at the other side of the Palace."

"Take Your Time," the Snake Said, Hurrying Off.

So the snake was off and Tommy was alone. And yet there was singing going on somewhere. It sounded as though many bumblebees and humming birds and crickets and katydids and birds were all singing very, very softly in chorus. It was like a lullaby. Although Tommy felt very wide awake he felt that if he tried very hard even he could take a sleep with the others.

The sun was shining down and the air was filled with the perfume of sweet fern. But the Palace was the most wonderful of all.

It was made of thatched brown grass and looked as though the grass of sunny, hilly fields had been gathered to make the Wind's Sleeping Palace.

At great entrance was a long grove of wild rosebushes, wild honeysuckle and ferns of all kinds. The windows of the Palace were edged by vines and there were turrets and towers and courtyards and rooms and rooms.

Chimneys were seen here and there. At least Tommy thought they were chimneys, for fluffy gray smoke passed along.

"It almost looks like the sky," Tommy said to himself. And at that moment he was joined by a lovely big butterfly.

"Did I hear you say the roof looked like the sky?" the butterfly asked.

Tommy nodded his head.

"It is the sky!" the butterfly exclaimed. "Do you suppose such a great and important person as the Wind would have anything less or lower than the sky for a roof? Gracious, no! Besides, the Wind says he can't sleep unless he has plenty of air and a view of the sky.

"It puts him to sleep, he says. The clouds pass overhead, and some of them look so fluffy that the Wind says they make him begin to dream of a soft bed and a pleasant sleep, and that in this way his roof sky rests him.

"The chorus sings, too, so as to sing to sleep all those who come to the Wind's Palace."

"Do many come here?" Tommy asked.

"Dear me, yes!" the butterfly answered. "Any of Mother Nature's children can come. There are any number of sleeping apartments, but the Wind has the great hall in the center of the palace for his sleeping room. He has gone there now.

"Before you get to the Wind's Sleeping hall you will find Tread Softly cupboard.

"There you can pick yourself out a pair of guaranteed-not-to-make-a-sound moss slippers.

"The Wind never wakes up by footsteps if these slippers are worn. But on your way in be sure to go through the Wind's Royal Wardrobe and see the Wardrobe Chief."

"Thanks," said Tommy, "for telling me all this."

"Well," the butterfly said, "you've been a friend to many members of our family. You've never caught us and pinned us with cruel pins. You've felt, I think, what it would be like to be pinned down and not be able to fly free and happy in the sunshine. Not that you've ever had such an experience but you can imagine how a butterfly must feel."

Then Tommy walked through the long grove which led to the great palace door. There he saw a huge sign. In bright golden letters on a great piece of birch were written these words:

"Attention! Attention! Attention! To visitors—The Wind is now asleep. Pray walk quietly and make no noise. Uphold the traditions of the palace. When the Wind dies down, as the Earth people say, there is silence and quiet."

Dear Editor:

ATLANTA named its beautiful park Grant park. That shows the proper spirit. The park, by the way, houses 132 different kinds of birds, according to a placard. Let's see—robins and sparrows and what else?

I visited the wonderfully impressive Confederate memorial being carved on Stone mountain. Eight years and two million dollars will be needed to complete it. Gifts so far come equally from South and North.

The federal prison at Atlanta is quite a building and is well patronized. In these days of hard competition and slim expense accounts there must be many a weary traveling man who envies the life of such an attractive jail. But don't get arrested in Georgia, for most convicts are put in a chain gang and set to work on the roads.—Fred Barton.

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

THE HEART OF A LOVER

SHOULD a maiden have two young men who are "paying her attention" and desire to ascertain the real state of their hearts with regard to herself, let her write down the names of the two young men and then cross out all the letters common to both of the names. Having done this touch the uncrossed letters in each of the names repeating in turn: "love, friendship, hate" and the last uncrossed letter in a name will indicate by the word which falls upon it the state of the heart of the name's owner. For instance, take John and Thomas. Cross out the "o" and the "h" in each name. Then begin with John say, touch the "J" and say "love," touch the "n" and say "friendship." John has only friendship for you. Then as to Thomas. Touch the "T" and say "love," the "m" and say "friendship," the "a" and say "hate," the "s" and say "love." John has a friendship for you—John loves you. In "working" this "charm," however, the whole name should be written out. This superstition which the researches of the American Folk-Lore society reveal as being especially prevalent in Canada and in some parts of the United States is another case of the survival of nomancy divining by names, a magic based on that primitive conception by which man's name was regarded as an integral part of the man's ego. It is a part of the belief of all savage tribes today and the polished nations of the classic period still retained so much of belief in it that nomancy was one of their most favorite methods of divination.

In the superstition under consideration the crossing out of the letters common to both names is clearly with the idea of reducing each name to its greatest degree of individuality or, as it were, for the purposes of greater differentiation. John's name is John himself; Thomas' name is Thomas himself. Anything common to John and Thomas you are not concerned with. Cross it out: you want their individual, differentiated egos. Having got them you proceed to question them.

NEW ADVENTURES

THE Byrd expedition has returned in triumph. Those who have kept in touch with the explorations of this expedition are convinced that a most valuable contribution has been made to science. These definite results will doubtless keep scientists busy in their laboratories for months and months to come.

Aside from the benefits accruing to science, the expedition has given the world a magnificent demonstration of courage, strength and fortitude of the highest possible attainment. Examples of this courage and fortitude were evidenced in the daily life of every man. A supreme test of it was when Commander Byrd set out from the base on that 18-hour airplane journey to the South pole. All he had to guide him was a sun glass and a field glass. The compass was of no value. The throwing away of the sack of provisions as well as the dangers encountered by mountain peaks were also tests of this courage. But courage was rewarded, for it was a momentous occasion when Commander Byrd threw over the South pole the American flag weighted down with a stone taken from the grave of the man in whose honor the airplane was named.

L. A. Barrett.

It was a very happy and significant fact that no lives were lost on the expedition. Every man got home safely. Commander Byrd speaks of these results in a very modest way, giving credit for the success of the undertaking to his men and his profound gratitude to Providence—credit where credit is due.

Now that the South pole problem has just been solved, doubtless the next great adventure will be an attempt to delve more deeply into the nature of the stars. A plane has been made in Germany capable of a speed of 95 miles per hour driven by powder rockets. A German scientist (Gottlieb Espenlaub) recently made aerial flight using three rockets, each burning six seconds. Might it not be possible to invent an apparatus capable of recording definite facts; to be projected on these rockets into the planets of our own solar systems? Are any of these plants inhabited? If so, would communication ever be possible?

Nothing seems impossible of accomplishment when the human mind can command the most exact scientific data, the spirit of the adventurer, and last but doubtless the most important of all—the courage, bravery and fortitude of men who have learned how to endure.

How One Woman Lost 20 Pounds of Fat

Lost Her Double Chin
Lost Her Prominent Hips
Lost Her Sluggishness
Gained Physical Vigor
Gained in Vivaciousness
Gained a Shapely Figure

If you're fat—first remove the cause!

KRUSCHEN SALTS contains the 6 mineral salts your body organs, glands and nerves must have to function properly.

When your vital organs fail to perform their work correctly—your bowels and kidneys can't throw off that waste material—before you realize it—you're growing hideously fat!

Try one half teaspoonful of KRUSCHEN SALTS in a glass of hot water every morning—in 3 weeks get on the scales and note how many pounds of fat have vanished.

Notice also that you have gained in energy—your skin is clearer—your eyes sparkle with glorious health—you feel younger in body—keener in mind. KRUSCHEN will give any fat person a joyous surprise.

Get an 85c bottle of KRUSCHEN SALTS from any leading druggist anywhere in America, (lasts 4 weeks). If this first bottle doesn't convince you this is the easiest, safest and surest way to lose fat—if you don't feel a superb improvement in health—so gloriously energetic—vigorously alive—your money gladly returned.

Toll of Years

William Gibson, of Girard, Ohio, swam the Ohio river at Ironton many times in his youth. Returning for a visit with relatives, he was enticed to the stream for his first swim in 30 years, dove in, paddled about a bit, and then headed for the Kentucky shore. He made it across, but returned to Ohio in a boat. "Both ways is too much for a man of sixty-seven," he puffed after reaching the southern bank.

Shakespeare for Africans

Shakespeare is being translated into Sechuana by Sol Plaatje, a native journalist of Bechuanaland, South Africa, and the idea is making a hit among the natives, who are greatly interested in the sayings of the Bard. "Let me have men about me that are fat," is an expression of opinion which they heartily indorse, for all tribes believe that chiefs and other leaders should always be distinguished from ordinary people by their imposing physique. One of the passages which they particularly appreciate is "When beggars die there are no comets seen; the heavens themselves blaze forth the death of princes." For the native tradition has always read notable events such as the birth or death of a ruler or brave warrior in the appearance of comets, meteors, and similar phenomena.

Men that are greatly guilty are never wise.—Burke.

When Food Sours

Lots of folks who think they have "indigestion" have only an acid condition which could be corrected in five or ten minutes. An effective anti-acid like Phillips Milk of Magnesia soon restores digestion to normal.

Phillips does away with all that sourness and gas right after meals. It prevents the distress so apt to occur two hours after eating. What a pleasant preparation to take! And how good it is for the system! Unlike a burning dose of soda—which is but temporary relief at best—Phillips Milk of Magnesia neutralizes many times its volume in acid.

Next time a hearty meal, or too rich a diet has brought on the least discomfort, try—

REDUCE COST OF UPKEEP OF AUTO

Use of Proper Oil and Attention to Filter Will Save Money.

Use of the proper grade oil and attention to the oil filter every 10,000 miles, engineers agree, will reduce cost of mechanical upkeep of the car, saving the motorist perhaps as high as $150 in car wear during the life of his automobile.

The thin oil film between the moving parts is what protects the automobile engine against wear. This film is six times thinner than the page of this paper. But it must be kept clean and free from carbon residue and other foreign matter.

Function Efficiency

This can be done by proper attention to the oil filter—the device through which the oil passes and is filtered. When the oil is filtered properly it has less tendency to form carbon residue or develop gummy matter which will absorb dust and dirt. The oil filter will function at highest efficiency up to 10,000 miles driving. After this mileage it becomes filled with carbon and other foreign matter and should be serviced immediately.

Inability of an oil to properly lubricate is nearly always the result of its contamination rather than faulty refinement, assuming, of course, that the correct grades to meet engine operating conditions have been selected.

Filter Cleans Oil.

The oil filter cleans the engine oil constantly at the rate of one quart a minute while the engine is running and the entire contents of the crankcase every five to ten minutes. In 10,000 miles of driving it removes sometimes as much as two pints of dirt, foreign matter and sludge from the oil, thus preventing this destructive material from injuring the engine's vital parts.

The use of an oil filter gives clean lubrication and reduces engine wear. But if the cartridge is not renewed every 10,000 miles, its whole purpose is defeated and wear of the engine parts will result from dirty oil.

After 10,000 miles of driving it is important that the filter cartridge be renewed. This is important because this mileage the filter unit becomes filled with dirt, sludge and other foreign matter taken from the oil.

New Device Is Help in Parking of Automobile

A device which may be installed on any automobile and which, it is said, will save time and space in parking, has been invented by R. W. Branson, an employee in the office of the state auditor at Jefferson City, Mo.

It consists of a set of two small auxiliary wheels that are attached to the front axle and which are hinged so that they may be dropped to the ground through a control on the instrument board. When the small wheels are touching the ground, the driver puts the car in reverse and backs up from two to four inches, raising the front end of the car on the auxiliary wheels and lifting the front wheels of the car off the ground.

As soon as this operation is carried out the steering gear automatically becomes attached to the auxiliary wheels and the driver may turn the car to either side by merely turning the steering wheel.

Faulty Contact Points Cause Engine to Miss

Missing of the engine and "bucking" frequently blamed on the carburetor are often due to nothing more than improper adjustment of spark plug of breaker point gaps or both. Before making carburetor adjustment in high compression engines the car owner or mechanic should make sure that the plug gap is adjusted according to the car manufacturer's recommendations, and breaker contact points are filed square and likewise adjusted.

Dirty or worn out plugs also cause trouble often blamed on the carburetor, and spark plugs and breaker contact points should be examined at least twice a year.

THE MOTOR QUIZ

(How Many Can You Answer?)

Q. Why should brakes be moderately applied for all stops?

Ans. This saves time, brake linings, and strain on the chassis. Let the car slow down gradually, bringing it to a standstill with moderate brake pressure when a red light is seen a block ahead.

Q. Name two ways to save a battery, other than by regular inspection of the battery.
